The house in which Lucie Ledanois lived had been her mother's; the furniture and other things in it had been her mother's; the two negro servants, who spoke only the Creole French patois, had been her mother's. It was a small house, but very beautiful inside. The exterior betrayed a lack of paint or the money with which to have painting done.

The Ledanois family, although distantly connected with others such as the Maillards, had sent forth its final bud of fruition in the girl Lucie. Her mother had died while she was yet an infant, and through the years she had companioned her father, an invalid, during the latter days. He had never been a man to count dollars or costs, and to a large extent he had outworn himself and the family fortunes in a vain search for health.

With Lucie he had been in Europe at the outbreak of war, and had come home to America only to die shortly afterward. Once deprived of his fine recklessness, the girl had found her affairs in a bad tangle. Under the guardianship of Maillard the tangle had been somewhat resolved and simplified, but even Maillard would appear to have made mistakes, and of late Lucie had against her will suspected something amiss in the matter of these mistakes.

It was natural, then, that she should take Jachin Fell into her confidence. Maillard had been her guardian, but it was to Fell that she had always come with her girlish cares and troubles, during even the lifetime of her father.

At precisely three o'clock of the Sunday afternoon Jachin Fell rang the doorbell and Lucie herself admitted him.

"Tell me quickly, Uncle Jachin!" eagerly exclaimed the girl. "Did you actually see the Midnight Masquer last night? I didn't know until afterward that he had really been downstairs and had robbed—"

"I saw him, my dear," and the little gray man smiled. There was more warmth to his smile than usual just now. Perhaps it was a reflection from the eager vitality which so shone in the eyes of Lucie. "I saw him, yes."

A restful face was hers—not beautiful at first glance; a little too strong for beauty, one would say. The deep gray eyes were level and quiet and wide apart, and on most occasions were quite inscrutable. They were now filled with a quick eagerness as they rested upon Jachin Fell. Lucie called him uncle, but not as she called Joseph Maillard uncle; here was no relationship, no formal affectation of relationship, but a purely abiding trust and friendship.

LESSON FOR AUGUST 13

ESTHER SAVES HER PEOPLE

LESSON TEXT—Esther 3:1-9:32.

GOLDEN TEXT—The righteous cry, and the Lord heareth, and delivereth them out of all their trouble.—Psalm 34:17.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Matt. 20:20-28; Rom. 5:6-10; 12:1, 2.

PRIMARY TOPIC—A Brave Young Queen.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Esther, the Brave Queen.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—A Heroine Worthy of Imitation.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Rendering Sacrificial Service.

I. Haman's Wicked Plot Against the Jews (3:1-4:3).

1. The occasion of (ch. 3). Mordecai refused to bow down to Haman whom the king had elevated to the place of prime minister and commanded that reverence should be shown him by all the princes and servants. In order to get rid of Mordecai Haman formulated a scheme and secured the king's endorsement to destroy all the Jews.

2. Fasting and mourning among the Jews (4:1-3). In their distress they sought the Lord. They did that which all those who believe in God had a right to do (Jas. 5:13).

II. Haman Checkmated (4:4-7:10).

1. Plot made known to Esther (vv. 4-8). Mordecai appeared before the king's gate clothed in sackcloth. This condition was reported to Esther by her maids and chamberlains. Upon his refusal to put away mourning Esther sent Hatach, her special attendant, to find out the cause of it.

2. Message to Esther (v. 8). This was in the form of a charge that she go unto the king and make request for her people.

3. Esther's hesitancy (vv. 9-12). This was on the ground of a certain law which made it a capital offense for anyone to come into the king's presence unbidden unless the king should extend clemency by holding out the golden scepter. The fact that Esther had not been called to come in for thirty days would seem that the queen was in disfavor.

4. Mordecai presses her obligation (vv. 14, 15). (1) Her own life was involved (v. 13). She might meet death if she went to the king unbidden, but most certainly she would meet death if she made no effort to avert the danger. Being in the king's house would not save her, for the decree had been made against the race of which she was a part. Her silence on this occasion would mean death. (2) She was not God's last resort (v. 14). He argues that deliverance would come from another source. God's work goes on and His purposes are fulfilled regardless of the decisions of men. (3) Reminds her that she had probably been raised up for this very work (v. 14). Every one has been born and prepared for some definite work. God's providence brings us into the particular circumstances where we can most definitely do His will.

5. Esther meets the call of duty (4:15-5:3). (1) Preparation by fasting (v. 16). She instructed Mordecai to gather together all the Jews in Shushan and fast for her for three days and nights. She with her maids did the same. (2) Went into the presence of the king (5:1-3). Having made the decision to do her duty regardless of consequences, after due preparation by fasting and prayer, she presented herself in royal apparel in the presence of the king. She decided that the best thing she could do was to lay her life on the altar. "If I perish, I perish" ought to be our watchword when face to face with duty. (3) King's promise to Esther (v. 3). He assured her that her desire would be granted even to the half of his kingdom.

6. Haman hanged (5:4-7:10)). Esther was shrewd as well as courageous. She invited the king and his prime minister to a banquet. At this banquet she proposed another for the following day, at which time she promised to make known to the king her request. Haman went home jubilant, but that night something occurred which turned the tide. The king discovered that no reward had been granted Mordecai for having saved his life. Haman is compelled to exalt Mordecai, and at the second feast the queen [illegible] treachery and he is [illegible] on the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai.

What Is It Worth to Change a Tire?

On the road changing a tire is not an especially pleasant task.

The dust or mud, the grease and grime, the tedious delay—all are things we like to avoid.

But the time to think about these things is when you buy the tire—not after the blow-out occurs.

For some tires blow out much more easily than others.

Outward appearance counts for little.

It is the material in the tire and the construction of it that determines its strength.

Goodyear recognizes these facts and all Goodyear Tires are made of long staple cotton.

Take the 30 x 3½ Cross Rib Clincher Tire here illustrated, for example.

It is made of Egyptian and Arizona cotton, the fibres of which average 1½ inches long.

Many 30 x 3½ clincher tires are made of short staple cotton from ½ inch to 1⅛ inches long.

This means less strength and greater danger of blow-outs—more tire troubles.

Yet this high grade guaranteed Goodyear Tire costs only $10.95.

You can buy some tires for even less than this but none with the fine materials and construction of this one.

Can you afford to take a chance on more frequent tire troubles for the sake of the slightly lower price of cheaper tires?

Suit Filed Against Clarence Malone

U. S. Lesh, Attorney General to the Highway Department, recently made the statement that streets in incorporated towns and cities connecing state highways are not a part of the state highway system and do not have to be maintained or repaired by the State Highway Department. The state highways end at the incorporation lines. Under certain conditions the state has the authority to assist in improving a city street connecting a state highway, but it is not responsible for the maintaining or repairing of that street, he said. This question arose at Sholes, and the Attorney General's opinion sustains a ruling given by John D. Williams, director of the State Highway Department.

Mash Feeding and Culling Demonstration

The month of August is a good time to start culling poultry, providing it hasn't been started before. Mash Feeding and Culling Demonstrations will be held during this month. Five different meetings have been scheduled to date. Others will be published as they are scheduled.

Better Progeny by Judging Tests

Just culling poultry is only one thing. By culling we can tell whether a hen is laying at the present or how long she has not been laying. Judging is another matter. It is going over a hen and noting the conformation of her body, the same as a livestock judge does with pigs and cows. By noting the shape, size and capacity of a hen, one can, to a great degree of certainty, tell whether she belongs to the high laying class or the low.

Not Enough Attention Paid to Selection of Breeders

Farmers, generally, in DeKalb Co., do not pay nearly as much attention to the selection of breeders in poultry according to the shape, size and capacity of body as they do with a pig. They always give the pig a thorough going over. They do not necessarily have to handle the pig so much, but with the hen they must because the feathers conceal the body.

That culling the poultry flock to get rid of those birds except the vigorous, prolific layers, results in noticeable improvement in the progeny is shown by recent investigations at the United States Experiment Farm, Beltsville, Md. The late moulters selected from a flock of 100 Rhode Island Reds in the fall of 1920 laid seven more eggs per bird during their second year than the original flock as pullets.

They were used as breeders the following spring, and the first Red pullets to commence laying in the fall of 1921 were found to be the offspring of these late-moulting hens. Their pullets in a period of seven months have already averaged about two dozen eggs per bird more than the original flock.

But it is not alone in number of eggs that the late-moulters' progeny excel, but also in the value of the product, as the distribution was more even, a much larger proportion of the eggs being laid during the winter months.

In the last seven months the daughters of the late moulters not only averaged two dozen eggs per bird more than the original flock, but the value of their product was, figuring at the same prices, about $1.04 per bird more during the same period. It is expected that this margin will increase during the next five months.

Pick out the late moulting hens, put a legband on them, and use these as your breeders for another year. Good livestock of any kind is profitable most of the time, but scrub and mongrel types are an expense most of the time. Which do you want?

Millers Pay Bonus for Trumbull and Gladden Wheats

The past two years the county agent has been reccommending Trumbull and Gladden wheats to the farmers of DeKalb Co. He first consulted the millers of the county concerning these varieties as to the milling qualities. The millers gave them a good recommendation. The fact that the millers in two counties in Ohio are now paying 10 cents per bushel premium, shows that this recommendation was right.

Last fall there were seen 268 acres of Gladden and 80 acres of Trumbull wheat in DeKalb Co. This means that there will be some seed available in our own county. One field of Trumbull the smooth variety has passed the first inspection for certification. This is a 25 acre field on the farm of Cloyd Snyder, north of Butler.

For the past three years the better wheat growers of Williams and Defiance counties, Ohio, have been raising and boosting Trumbull and Gladden wheats. Recent experiments have shown that these two improved varieties are superior in milling and baking qualities to the ordinary wheats. or those who want a smooth wheat, the Trumbull will "fill the bill." Those who want a bearded wheat, the Gladden will command attention.

Red Rock Wheat

In some parts of DeKalb Co., particularly the northwest part, Red Rock wheat is being grown. In all there are 278 acres of this variety in the county. It is going strong in Fairfield Twp. There are two fields in the county that have passed the first inspection for certification. These fields are on the farms of Wm. Tritch and J. W. Mertz.

Red Rock wheat has good milling qualities and is a very popular wheat in Michigan.

Michikoff Wheat

A new recent wheat has been developed as a cross from Michigan Amber and the Malakoff. It has been named the Michikoff. It is the hardest winter wheat raised in Indiana and remains hard. It does not get soft in quality after being in the climate a few years. The only trouble now is there are but only a few acres in Indiana.

There will be only one field in this county. This field has passed the first inspection for certification and is on the farm of F. M. Brewer, in Butler township.

What Will be the Price of Wheat?

Summarizing all conditions, the world's wheat import requirements for the coming year sem to exceed those of the last twelve months by 75,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels. The decreased wheat acreage and poorer condition of the central and western European crop suggesting a yield of 100,000,000 bushels less than last year, together with the possibility of a further increase in per capita consumption on the one hand will be partly offset by a larger rye acreage with a prospect of decreased wheat exports to the Orient on the other. In the last year world imports amounted to approximately 640,000,000 bushels. If the importing countries are able to buy as much as they need the total would be around 725,000,000 bushels or more. This is more than the total supply in sight from exporting countries which means that the world will consume more than it produces and must cut into the normal carryover at the end of the next crop year.

These import requirements average approximately 60,000,000 monthly compared with about 53,000,000 bushels monthly in the last twelve months. Outside of the limited supply in the southern hemisphere the bulk of the wheat needed in the next eight months, amounting to about 480,000,000 bushels, must be bought in the United States and Canada. [illegible] of this wheat has been contracted for thus far. This buying should be of a strong supporting influence during the rest of the summer and fall when the heavy movement from farms in the United States and Canada occurs.

Furthermore, if the preceding estimates upon crop surpluses in exporting countries and import requirements of the deficiency nations prove to be correct so that [illegible]

[illegible] lion bushels out of a crop of 155 million bushels as compared with last year's export of 39 million bushels out of a crop of 170 million bushels. Australia had exported 73 million bushels out of a crop of 132 millions as compared with exports last year of 67 million out of a crop of 144 million bushels. Moreover, the visible supplies in the United Kingdom amount to only 59 million bushels as against 79 million last year, and reports continue to drift of a smaller European wheat yield than a year ago.

By noting the above reports and figures it looks like the price of wheat will be higher before another season.

DeKalb County Notes

Big Bill Settles of Wells Co., will speak at the Franklin Twp. picnic at 11:00 A. M. in Houghton's Grove on Saturday, Aug. 12th. In the afternoon he will speak at the Fairfield Twp. picnic at 3:00 P. M., in Case's Grove. These are the only two places that Mr. Settles is likely to speak in DeKalb Co. He is worth going clear across the county to hear. Residents of other townships are cordially invited to come and hear Mr. Settles.

On Thursday, Aug. 17th, Smithfield Twp. will hold their farm bureau picnic. They have secured C. S. Masterson as principal speaker for the afternoon. Mr. Masterson is a powerful speaker. More might be said but come and hear him.

Chinch Bugs are doing considerable damage in some spots in the county. Some of the farmers are using gas tar from the local gas plant. It works satisfactorily. The farmers of Van Wert Co., Ohio, have used 14,000 gallons of this tar.

The Fairfield Twp. Ladies Home Economics Club held their regular monthly meeting Friday, July 28, at the community house. Miss Vandivier vocational home economics instructor from Auburn, gave a demonstration of the making of artificial flowers for hat trimmings.

The Butler District Boy's Pig Club met in the City Hall at Butler. Each boy gave a report on how he was handling his pig, what he was feeding, etc. Russel Praul is president and Raymond Snyder, Sec'y-Treas. of the club.

All people interested in better poultry and better poultry methods are going to attend the county poultry tour Aug. 17th. W. H. Fitting of the Extension Dept. Purdue University, will be present on the trip.

LOOKING IN ON CONGRESS

CONGRESSMAN HARDY CONTRIBUTES INTERESTING SERIES TO THE ST. JOE NEWS

Readers of The News are fortunate in having the opportunity to read the series of articles just started in this paper under the general heading of "Looking in on Congress from the House Gallery," written by Congressman Guy U. Hardy of Colorado. There will be six articles in the series, each treating of one of the following subjects:

"First View of Congress," "About the Members," "What the House is Like," "A Congressman's Day," "The Story of a Bill," and "Seniority."

Mr. Hardy, as well as representing his district in Congress, is editor and publisher of the Daily City Record at Canon City, Colo., and writes in an understandable way that gives the reader an intimate view of the House in action, and those who follow this series will know more about the great law-making body than they ever did before. Not only for the information contained in these articles will they be of interest, but Mr. Hardy is an entertaining writer in a general way.

ROADS STAND BY LOYAL EMPLOYEES

Tell President Harding Old and New Men Must Be Protected in Strike Settlement.

NOT A MATTER OF CHOICE

Faithful Employees Have Both Legal and Moral Rights to Seniority and Other Benefits.

New York.—The keynote of the reply made by railway executives representing more than 180 Class I Railroads of the United States to the proposition of President Harding, that "all strikers be returned to their work and their former positions with seniority and other rights unimpaired," lies in the last paragraph from their reply to the President as follows:

> "It is submitted that the striking former employees cannot be given preference to employees at present in the service without doing violence to every principle of right and justice involved in this matter, and without the grossest breach of faith on the part of the railroads to the men at present in their service.
> "Under these circumstances, it becomes apparent that the railroads cannot consider any settlement of the present strike which does not provide protection in their present employment both to the loyal employees who remained in the service and to the new employees entering it."

The executives had accepted the first two conditions proposed by the President, namely, that both employers and employees accept the decisions of the Labor Board, and that all law suits growing out of the strike be withdrawn; and in relation to the third condition spoke not only as quoted above, but also as follows:

Agree With the President

"The railroad executives and managers agree entirely with the President's statement in his letter that 'it is wholly unthinkable that the Railroad Labor Board can be made a useful agency of the Government in maintaining industrial peace in the railway service unless employers and workers are both prompt and unquestioning in their acceptance of its decisions.'

"Many men in the service refused to join the strike and in so doing were assured of the seniority rights accruing to them and of the permanence of their positions. On some important lines 50 per cent or more refused to join the strike. To these old loyal employees have been added thousands of new men who were employed and could be secured only upon a definite promise that their services would be retained regardless of the settlement of the strike, with all the rights appertaining to such employment, including that of seniority under the working rules and regulations previously approved by the Railroad Labor Board.

"Just the Opposite Effect"

"We especially point out that a refusal to the old men who remained in the service and to the new men who accepted service of the rights of seniority incident to their employment would have just the opposite effect to that desired by the President, and would most seriously discredit the Labor Board.

"The board itself prescribed the rules of seniority under which the men referred to have secured their seniority rights, and the railroad companies have neither the legal nor moral right to deprive these men of those rights. By public utterances since the strike began the board has recognized and emphasized these rights, and to deny them now would, instead of upholding the authority of the Labor Board, overthrow its rules and discredit its authority.

"The Chairman of the Labor Board at the time the strike was called made the following public statement:

> "Upon one question the striking employees should not be deceived. Their leader has said that the strikers are no longer employees of the railways, and they have thus automatically abandoned all the rights they possess under their agreements and under the decisions of the board, including their seniority. This is not the [illegible] action. It is their own.

WIDNEY BLOCK BURNS TO GROUND

Home Coming

Spencerville is looking forward to the greatest celebration in its history for next Saturday, July 19, which is to be their third Annual Home Coming and Old School Reunion.

The place is at Henderson's grove one-half mile west of Spencervelle. A full day's program has been arranged as you will find from the large bills printed here last week. If you will take your dinner and join in, you will have a wonderful time.

Sechler Reunion

The Sechler family reunion was held at the home of B. E. Widney and wife, Sunday. Fifty-seven members of the family were present. The morning was spent in the gatheriug of the clan, greetings and visiting. At noon a bountiful basket dinner was served followed by a fine little program and election of officers as follows: President, Mrs. Rose Widney; Vice President, John Sechler; Secretary, Edith Widney; Treasurer, Merritt Sechler; Program committee, Wm. Staman, Jr. and wife, Mrs. Frank Baltz and Merritt Sechler.

St. Joe's Third Big Fire Occurred Saturday Morning at 1:10, Destroying Entire Widney Block and Adjoining Dwelling Owned by Leslie Meek; Others Damaged; Total Loss $8400

The third disastrous fire to go down in the history of St. Joe occurred Saturday morning about one o'clock, when the entire Widney Block with some of the contents of its three rooms, and an adjoining dwelling house to the east, were totally destroyed. Had it not been for a favorable breeze blowing from the northeast and the heroic efforts of the local fire department the entire business block on the north side of the street, beyond any doubt whatever, would have been swept out. As it was, with the sparks being carried away from the closest buildings, it was only by the sacrificing efforts on the part of our firemen that the home of Mrs. Ada Berry on the north side and that of Champ Bailey on the east side were not burned with the others.

The loss can hardly be estimated exactly. Nothing was removed from the second and upper floor of the Widney building, which was known as the Widney Opera House and has been used for all community affairs. Its contents consisted of chairs, a piano, two stoves, stage scenery and roller skates. Elgin Curie has been manager of the room

The west room on the first floor was occupied by a restaurant owned by E. P. Brown. Nearly all of its contents were removed except that at the rear of the room where the heat was too intense to approach. Many improvements had been made to the room recently in the way of papering, painting and refurnishing. chiefly at the expense of the proprietor. Mr. and Mrs. Brown were not at home, having left for an outing trip to Van Wert and Celina, Ohio, on Friday morning and could not be reached with the word of their loss until Sunday. They reached home that night. A son, Walter, was left in charge of the restaurant.

The Charles Rice Drug Store occupied the east room, which probably sustained the greatest loss. Men worked in a desperate manner to save all the contents, but were unable to remove many of the things from the rear where wall paper and many bottles of drug were stored. Some of the goods when removed, were carried across the street and laid on the ground near the walk. When the fire reached the front of the building the heat was so intense that some of these articles were burned.

The Widney Block was a brick veneer structure built in 1900 by O. H. Widney. It has been owned for years by Mrs. Lenore Kagey of Warsaw.

The frame two-story dwelling adjoining on the east, which was destroyed, and lot were purchased less than a month ago from Mrs. Kagey by Leslie Meek who has for several years had his barber shop in the front room on the lower floor. The other part of the house was recently vacated by Mr. and Mrs. Hickman, who operated a cream [illegible] in the room down stairs and lived in the upstairs. Mr. Meek [illegible] his new [illegible] in the property.

[illegible] Ada Berry [illegible] on the north and Champ Bailey on the east. [illegible] Bailey home they were able to hang a large rug from the eaves and cover the roof with other rugs and blankets which by keeping well soaked with water protected the building. Fire did not catch here at all but the heat was very intense for a short time. All the contents of these homes were removed early. The home of Paul Curie across the street on the west was so seriously threatened that the fire fighters gave up and the furniture was hurriebly removed. Just then the brick wall fell in and the heat seemed to spread and grew less intense. The stock from the H. G. Hursh store was also removed. The home of Frank Meese, one square west of the fire scene, and that of Danie Myers three squares distant, were discovered to be on fire caught from a burning piece carried by the wind. These blazes were put out before any particular damage was done. Every building west of the fire as far as Spencerville Street was watcheb. The intense heat caused the large plate front glass to crack in the Ed Leighty store and in the Ada Berry cream station across the street to the south.

Probably the first person to discover the fire was Mrs. Ada Berry. She was awakened by the cracking of the flames shooting from the storage room at the rear of the Widney block, which is only a distance of ten feet from her bedroom window. She gave the alarm to Fred Leighty who immediately rushed to the town hall and rang the fire bell. Mrs Berry stated that although the blazes was shooting from the entire end of the store room, the greatest progress was being made from the west side at the rear end of the restaurant. For this reason it is thought that the blaze originated on the west side.

The cause of the fire is a mystery. [illegible]

To The People Of Our Community

We wish to thank the people who worked to save our stock and fixtures from the recent fire. Not enough can be said of the noble work that was done. While our loss is a heavy one, it might have been worse and we are thankful to have saved what we now have. With the co-operation of the people we will be able to rebuild our store to what it should be and give you our best in service and prices.

Again thanking you for the assistance rendered, we are,

Gratefully yours,

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. H. Rice.

Is Very Grateful

I wish in this manner to thank the St. Joe Fire Company and the community in general for their heroic efforts in saving my home on the night of the fire. Words cannot express my appreciation.

American Farm Bureau

Interior of Hamersville Cream Shipping Station, Brown County, Ohio.

Improvement of the quality of the butterfat produced as well as a better price to the producer is resulting from the establishment of local co-operative cream shipping stations in Ohio, dairy leaders in that state assert. About 40 such stations were operating by the end of July. Additional stations will be opened this fall.

New Venture in Ohio.

The cream shipping station is a comparatively new venture in the co-operative field in Ohio. The first one was established in Knox county in December, 1920. The largest number are in the northwestern and southwestern portions of the state with a few scattered in other sections.

The stations established are handling in the neighborhood of a ton of butterfat a week, according to E. D. Waid, dairy marketing specialist, Ohio Farm Bureau federation. The local station acts as a local weighing, testing and shipping agency and performs its services at an average cost of about two cents a pound. Sales are made through agencies formed by the combination of a number of stations.

There are many advantages to this plan of cream shipment, according to leaders of the movement. To the producer it means getting paid for the care he takes in furnishing a high-class product. It also means a higher price through the collective sale of his product. In addition he has the satisfaction of knowing what his product tests, as shown by the figures obtained by his own representative.

Of Benefit to Buyer.

The buyer benefits in that he can purchase a large quantity of butterfat from one source on a contract for a number of months. The expense of maintaining a large number of competitive collection stations, many of which will not pay the cost of operation, is done away with. He is also assured of a better grade of butterfat. This is proved by the statements of buyers themselves in many communities, who say they have been receiving as high as 75% No. 1 grade, where they formerly received as low as 20% No. 1 during the hot months.

The increased return to producers averages from two to three cents a pound above prices received through other channels, according to reports received by the Ohio federation. When a ton or more of fat is handled each week this amounts to considerable saving to the community.

ENGLISHMEN TELL OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS

Farmers' Union of England Is Purely Service Society, Similar to Farm Bureau.

Two visitors walked into the offices of the American Farm Bureau federation one day recently. They were T. C. Ward, Sambrook Hall, Newport, Salop, England, a member of the National Farmers' Union Council of England and Wales, and T. Morrey, Hungersheath Ashley, Market Drayton, England. They were intersted in the Farm Bureau of America, and in comparing it with their organization—the farm bureau of England, purely a service organization similar to ours. They explained that national headquarters are in London. A county organzation exists in each shire of England and Wales. At the present time they have 125,000 members. The organization is supported by an assessment of two pence per acre. About one-third of this amount goes to the London office. Last year the London office had a yearly budget of approximately $150,000. The national organization has a president and several vice presidents who devote considerable time to the work and are elected annually. They can serve only one year. In addition to these officers a general secretary is employed and under him are the various departments. They have a legislative and a publicity department. A statistical department takes care of tariff and transportation matters. In addition they have various other service departments.

There are three main classes of farmers in England—one of the landlords, another the tenants and small farmers, and another the farm laborers. The Farmers' union in England is the organization representing the tenant farmers and the small land owners. The percentage of [illegible]

Milk is retailing on the London market at 40 cents a gallon. Farmers are getting 16½ cents a gallon f. o. b. cars London. No bottled milk is sold in London. It is all dipped from the can. The dairy farmers are finding that the making of cheese is the most profitable in dairy operation. At the present time they are getting between 24 cents and 27 cents per pound.

These Englishmen remarked at the great difference between the price that the farmer receives in this country and the price the consumer has to pay.

ALL ABOUT VACUUM TUBE AS AMPLIFIER

Connected Up to Furnish Rated Filament Current and Maintain Plate Potential.

Figure XXIV shows a three-electrode vacuum tube connected with the "A" battery to furnish the rated filament current and a "B" battery to maintain rated plate potential. In the plate circuit is a current meter to read the plate current. A "C" battery is connected in the grid circuit to maintain the grid at the positive potential O-A in order to have the tube operate at the point A on the characteristic curve. To T-T will be connected the alternating difference of potential having a maximum positive value equal to A-C and a maximum negative value equal to A-B.

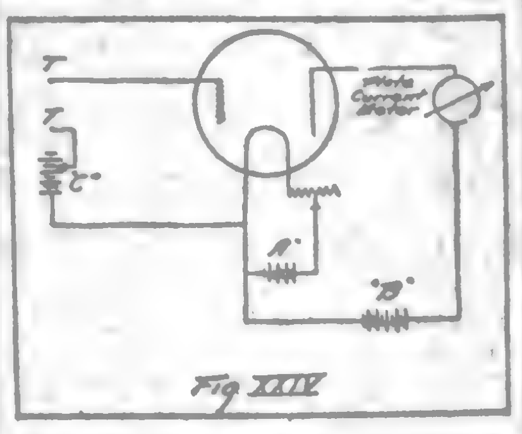

Fig XXIV

The resulting variation in plate current is shown in Fig. XXV. Inserting the tube functioning as an amplifier, with an amplification factor of K, between the supply of alternating difference of potential at T-T, was just K times what it actually is.

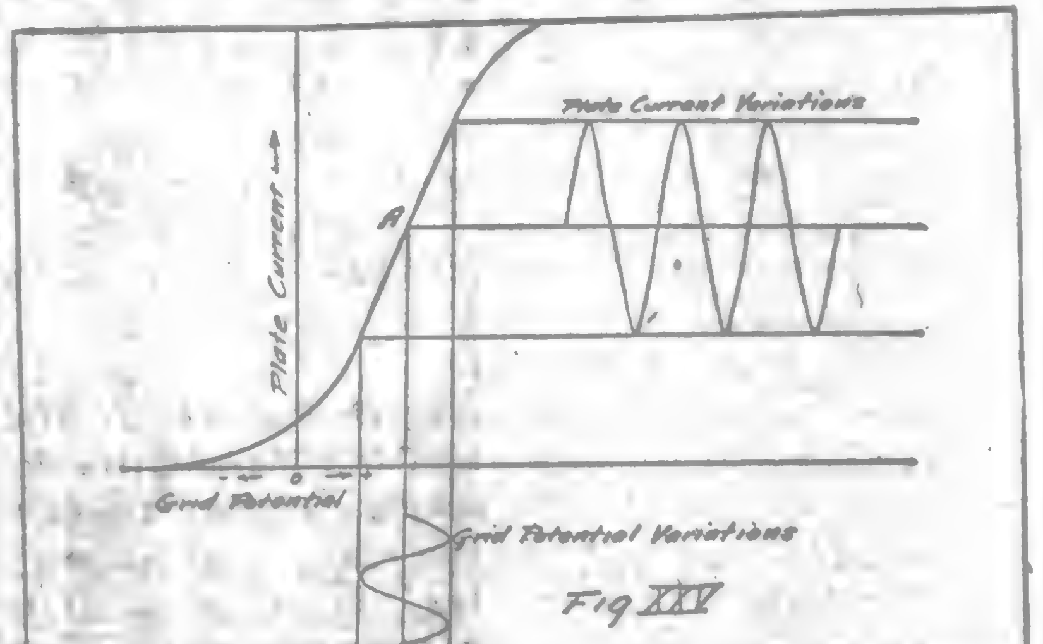

Fig XXV

All these considerations have been based on the assumption that the total impedance (resistance to the flow of an alternating current) of the entire plate circuit existed internally in the tube between the filament and the plate, and that the external electrical circuit from the plate to the filament had zero impedance. Of course, this condition never exists in practice. The external plate circuit always has impedance in it in the form of telephone receivers, resistance choke coils, or transformer primaries, depending upon the means that is employed to couple the successive tubes together.

It is only where the external plate circuit of a vacuum tube has zero impedance that the plate voltage is equal to that of the "B" battery. As soon as an impedance is introduced into the external plate circuit, part of the total potential of the "B" exists as a drop across the external impedance, so that only a portion of the total "B" battery is available at the plate.

Fig. XXVI represents the characteristic curve of the tube as we have been discussing it, with no impedance in the external plate circuit. This curve is called the "static" characteristic curve, to differentiate from the others. Suppose that we introduce into the external plate circuit an impedance in the form of a resistance as shown by R in Fig. XXVII. When the current flows around when RI increases, ZI must decrease. This means that when a constant "B" battery potential is applied to the plate circuit of a vacuum tube, containing external resistance, an increase in plate current causes a decrease in the potential existing between the plate and the filament.

The "static" characteristic curve was drawn on the assumption that the difference in potential between the plate and the filament remained constant, obviously then, when the external plate circuit has other than zero impedance, the static characteristic curve no longer holds true.

The characteristic curve of a tube having other than zero impedance in the external plate circuit is the "dynamic" characteristic. The greater the variations in plate current, the greater the variation in the voltage existing between the plate and the filament. If the value of R, the external plate impedance, is increased, the greater will be the variation in the plate to filament voltage for the same variation in plate current.

In Fig. XXVI (2) is represented the dynamic characteristic of a tube with a certain definite value of R in the plate circuit. Curve (3) represents the dynamic characteristic of the same tube with a larger value of R in the plate circuit. Finally the extreme condition is reached, in which R is made infinitely high and the dynamic characteristic becomes parallel to the grid voltage axis as in (4). This shows that variations of grid potential would produce no variation of plate current, but maximum variations of plate variations of plate potential. These would be amplified variations of grid potential variations.

This last condition of having the variations of plate potential amplified variations of grid potential variations is the ideal condition sought for in vacuum tube amplifiers.

In Fig. XXVII as the current of the plate circuit flows through the resistance R there is a drop in potential across R between the points X and Y that will be proportional to the current flowing. If the value of R and the plate potential are high enough this potential variation between X and Y will be exactly proportional to and K times that applied to the grid of the tube at T-T.

To amplify a signal from a radio receiver then, it is only necessary to have a circuit whose output is to be amplified connected to T-T and the amplified output taken off at X and Y. If greater amplification is desired the output from X and Y is run through another circuit similar to that shown in Fig. XXVII.

SPARKS

The "Totemites," a society of radio fans at Seattle, decided that receiving code signals during broadcast programs is inevitable, and instead of registering complaints opened a free school to its members for instruction in the code.

Looking In on Congress From the House Gallery

A CONGRESSMAN'S DAY

By CONGRESSMAN GUY U. HARDY

Copyright, 1922, Western Newspaper Union.

Most people think that a congressman has a soft snap. Little work, big pay, bright lights, much society. I suppose I used to think so. I had seen the legislature at work, and I naturally supposed that such an important body as the congress would not work more continuously than does a state legislature. I had never seen much of the eastern part of the country, and when I came down here I found myself planning little week-end trips to New York, Atlantic City, New England and near-by places.

But I had another guess coming. The congress takes mighty few week-end recesses.

In olden times, a few years ago in fact, the congress was in session, more or less leisurely, for about half the year. The members could spend a good deal of time back home where congressmen are not so numerous and where their official title cuts more ice than it does here in Washington. But during the past six or seven years the congress has been in almost continuous session. The war, of course, threw a big burden on congress and brought about the extra long sessions. The talk here would indicate that for a long time to come a member will spend most of his time in Washington.

The house meets every day at twelve o'clock noon and continues in session usually until five or six o'clock at night, and some times later. It meets usually every day except Sunday. It observes few legal holidays and has taken only short recess at Christmas times.

When the house is in session a member rarely leaves the hill. He may not sit in the house all the time, but he sticks around nearby so as to be on hand if a quorum is needed or a vote taken.

He gets his lunch whenever he can. There is a restaurant in the capitol and in the house office building, and he usually eats hurriedly in one of these when he finds a slack time. Men's tastes in lunches vary everywhere, but I have observed that members are usually light eaters at lunch time. The speaker and several other men of my acquaintance always take a pint bottle of milk and eat it in a bowl with crackers or bread. This may be followed by ice cream, pie or some simple dessert.

Hard Work in Committees.

If a member had nothing else to do but to attend sessions of the house and give some study, thought and consideration to the big problems before congress he would find himself quite well occupied. But that is only half of the work—perhaps not half. Much of the business of congress is conducted in committees.

Every bill is first considered in a committee, and sometimes a committee spends weeks or months holding hearings and considering a single bill. This was true of the revenue, tariff, bonus, immigration, educational, prohibition enforcement, appropriation and other big bills. Some committees meet every day for weeks at a time, and others at less frequent intervals. Committees usually meet at ten o'clock in the morning. Sometimes they go on working while the house is in session and sometimes they meet at night.

Some members have very hard committee work and some are more or less fortunate, as they choose to look at it. As a rule, every committee wants to consider every bill that can possibly be referred to it, and almost every member is anxious to get on the most important and hardest working committees.

Then there is the office work. The mail brings lots of office work. The office and departmental work alone would keep a man fairly busy all of the time if he worked union hours.

Much Business With Departments.

The practice has grown up for many people to write their congressman about their business with the various departments. The Western members get a great deal more of this class of work to do than do the members from the East and South. The public land tracts furnish much business that must be looked after at the general land office. During the week a member is apt to have business before the Interior department, the forestry service, the pension bureau, the veterans' bureau and the Post Office department. And he may have an immigration case before the Labor department, a [illegible] case before the Department [illegible] some business in some branch [illegible] department, and al[illegible] any other [illegible] in Washington.

[illegible]

Society affairs are not on the daily program of many members. A few large receptions may be attended and a few dinners exchanged, but the average member wears his evening clothes, if he has any, less frequently in Washington than he does in his home town.

So it may be seen that a congressman, if he takes his job seriously, soon finds that in Washington he is just a plain, everyday workingman with a daily program full and complete.

A CONGRESSMAN'S MAIL

A congressman's desk is full of mail and propaganda.

What do the people write about? you ask.

Well, about almost everything under the sun. The congressman is the bureau of information for his district. He is the direct representative for his district of the great government at Washington to which all people turn when in need or distress.

Letters come favoring or opposing legislation; asking for information on every conceivable subject; asking for government aid in all sorts of enterprises; asking help to get people out of all sorts of difficulties and troubles; asking for information that will help boys and girls in debates; asking for decisions to help settle bets; asking for literature on all manner of subjects; asking for aid in getting post offices and rural routes established.

The homesteader seeks his congressman's assistance in land office matters. The old soldier and the soldier of later wars bring many problems to their congressman. The mothers of soldiers often have need of help in the way of delayed insurance adjustments, a discharge for the boy who enlisted under age, and occasionally help to get clemency for a boy in prison. The farmer asks for bulletins, agriculture year books, garden seed, rare field seed, farm loans and a variety of other things. One wrote in and asked for the loan of a government bull. They also write often about fence laws, road laws and high taxes on real estate—with all of which the federal government has nothing to do.

Claims against the government produce much mail and some work. Some of the claims are recent and collectable, but many are for losses during the Civil war and before, and these, however just, are hard to do anything with at this late date.

Many people write urging larger appropriations for various departments of the government in which they or their communities are directly interested. Some urge greater appropriations and lower federal taxes at the same time.

Some letters refer to jobs the writers would like to obtain, but as a congressman has little influence in procuring jobs now since nearly all government positions have seen but in the civil service, this class of letters does not crowd the desk.

There are many unclasified requests, such as one from the citizens of a certain town alleging that the citizens of another town had stolen their courthouse in the night and asking for its return through government agency.

Propaganda Is Plentiful.

Then there is the propaganda, which is in a class by itself. It comes from all quarters of the globe and covers all subjects relating to life, from birth control to government graveyards. It is delivered by wire, mail and messenger. It runs in volume from a telegram or post card to bound books. No subject is suggested in congress, it seems, that does not bring forth a shower of propaganda, and some subjects bring a deluge.

So you can see that a congressman's desk is apt to be full of mail. His office is quite a business institution. If he had no legislative duties to perform he would find his whole time well employed in taking care of the mail, and the requests for service which the mails bring in.

And withal let me say that a congresman likes to hear from home. He wants to be of service to his constituents. He courts the business, so to speak. He is proud of the big bunch of mail that comes in and is pleased to see a big bunch go out at the close of the day. A big mail indicates a close touch with home. Most members answer most letters. I have replied to every letter that has come to my office from Colorado, except one. That came from a sort of anarchist, I would judge. Anyway, I could hardly dictate a proper reply to a lady stenographer, so that single letter among the thousands went into the waste basket, unanswered.

FELL AND LUCIE

SYNOPSIS.—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season Jachin Fell, wealthy though somewhat mysterious citizen, and Dr. Ansley, are discussing a series of robberies by an individual known as the Midnight Masquer, who, invariably attired as an aviator, has long defied the police. Joseph Maillard, wealthy banker, is giving a ball that night, at which the Masquer has threatened to appear and rob the guests. Fell and Ansley, on their way to the affair, meet a girl dressed as Columbine, seemingly known to Fell, but masked, who accompanies them to the ball. Lucie Ledanois, recently the ward of her uncle, Joseph Maillard, is the Columbine. At the ball, Bob Maillard, son of the banker, again proposes to her and is refused. He offers to buy some of her property. A Franciscan monk interests her. He turns out to be Prince Gramont. In his library Joseph Maillard and a group of his friends are held up and robbed by the Midnight Masquer. Lucie Ledanois, the last of an old family, is in straitened circumstances. Joseph Maillard's handling of her funds has been unfortunate. Fell is an old friend of her parents and deeply interested in the girl. Henry Gramont, really the Prince de Gramont, is enamored of Lucie.

"You saw him?" repeated the girl, quickly. "What was he like? Do you know who he is?"

"Certainly I know," replied Fell, still smiling at her.

"Oh! Then who is he?"

"Softly, softly, young lady! I know him, but even to you I dare not breathe his name until I obtain some direct evidence. Let us call him Mr. X., after the approved methods of romance, and I shall expound what I knew.

"The bandit did not enter the house during the evening, nor did he leave, nor was he found in the house afterward," he went on, tonelessly. "So, incredible as it may appear, he was one of the guests. This Mr. X. came to the dance wearing the aviator's costume, or most of it, underneath his masquerade costume. When he was ready to act, he doffed his outer costume, appeared as the Midnight Masquer, effected his purpose, then calmly donned his outer costume again and resumed his place among the guests. You understand?

"Well, then! Maillard yesterday received a note from the Masquer, brazenly stating that he intended to call during the evening. I have that note. It was written with an extremely hard pencil, such as few men carry, because it does not easily make very legible writing. Last night I asked Mr. X. for a pencil, and he produced one with an extra hard lead—mentioning that he had borrowed it from Bob Maillard, as indeed he had."

"What! Surely you don't mean—"

"Of course I don't. Mr. X. is very clever, that's all. Here is what took place last night. Mr. X. brought us another note from the Masquer, saying that he had found it pinned to the library door. As a matter of fact, he had written it on a leaf torn from his notebook. I took the note from him, observing at the time that the paper had no pin holes. Probably Mr. X. saw that there was something amiss; he presently went back downstairs, took the remainder of the torn leaf from his notebook, and pinned it to the door. A little later I met him and mentioned the lack of pin holes; he calmly referred me to the piece on the door, saying that he had merely torn off the note without removing the pins. You follow me?"

"Of course," murmured the girl, her eyes wide in fascinated interest. "And he knew that you guessed him to be the Masquer?"

"He suspected me, I think," said Fell, mildly. "It is understood that you will not go about tracing these little clues?"

"Don't be silly, Uncle Jachin!" she broke in. "You know I'll do nothing of the sort. Go on, please! Did you find the airplane?"

"Yes." Jachin Fell smiled dryly. "I was thinking of that as I left the house and came to the line of waiting automobiles. A word with one of the outside detectives showed me that one of the cars in the street had been testing its engine about midnight. I found that the car belonged to Mr. X.

"How simple, Lucie, and how very clever! The chauffeur worked a powerful motor with a muffler cutout at about the time Mr. X., inside the house, was making his appearance. It scarcely sounded like an airplane motor, yet frightened and startled people would imagine that it did. Thus arose the legend that the Midnight Masquer came and departed by means of airplane—a theory aided ingeniously by his costume. Well, that is all I know or suspect, my dear Lucie! And now—"

"Now, I suppose," said the girl, thoughtfully, "you'll put that awful Creole of yours on the track of Mr. X.? Ben Chacherre is a good [illegible] and he's [illegible] [illegible] I don't [illegible] that he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his books."

"Exactly—Ben is at work," asserted Jachin Fell. "The gentleman under suspicion is very prominent. To accuse him without proof would be utter folly. To catch him in flagrante delicto will be difficult. So I am in no haste. Besides, I can as yet discover no motive for his crimes, since he is quite well off financially. Well, no matter! Now that I have fully unbosomed myself, my dear, it is your turn."

"All right, Uncle Jachin." Lucie took a large morocco case from the chair beside her, and extended it. "You lent me these things to wear last night, and I—"

"No, no," intervened Fell. "I gave them to you, my dear—in fact, I gave them to you two years ago, and kept them until now! You have worn them; they are yours, and you become them better than even did poor Queen Hortense! So say no more."

Lucie leaned forward and imprinted a kiss upon the cheek of the little gray man. "There! that is all the thanks I can give you, dear uncle; the gift makes me very happy, and I'll not pretend otherwise. Only, I feel as though I had no right to wear them—they're so wonderful!"

"Nonsense! But all this isn't why you summoned me here, you bundle of mystery! What bothered you last night, or, rather, who?"

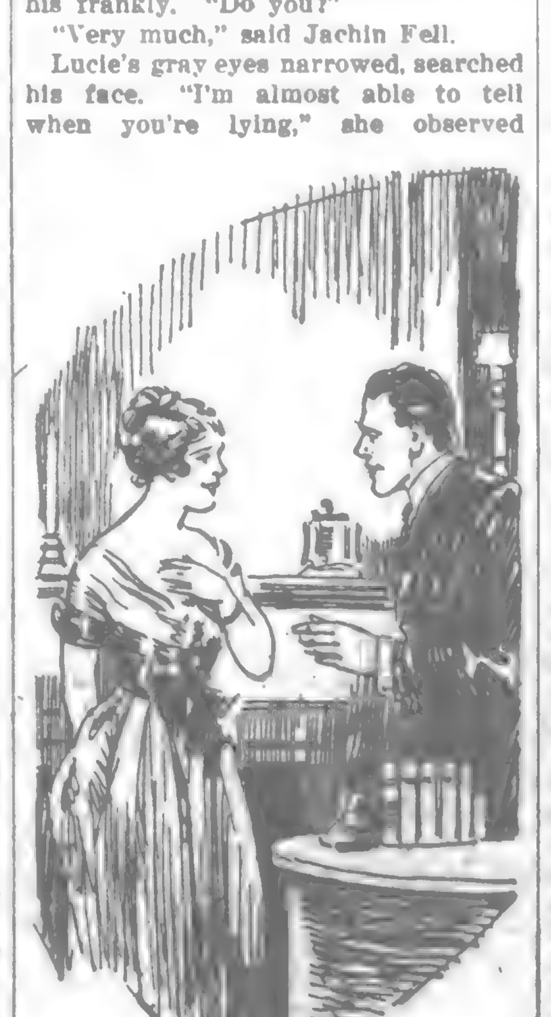
Lucie laughed. "There was a Franciscan who tried to be very mysterious, and to read my mind. He talked about oil, about a grasping, hard man, and mentioned you as my friend. Then he warned me against a proposal that Bob might make; and sure enough, Bob did propose to buy what land is left to me on Bayou Terrebonne, saying he'd persuade his oil company that there was oil on it, and that they'd buy or lease it. I told him no. The Franciscan, afterward, proved to be Henry Gramont; I wondered if you had mentioned—"

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed Mr. Fell, piously. "I never even met Gramont until last night! Do you like him?"

"Very much." The girl's eyes met his frankly. "Do you?"

"Very much," said Jachin Fell.

Lucie's gray eyes narrowed, searched his face. "I'm almost able to tell when you're lying," she observed calmly. "You said that a trifle too hastily, Uncle Jachin. Why don't you like him?"



"Poor Taste, Mademoiselle, to Grow Weary of Such Beauty!"

Fell laughed, amused. "Perhaps I have a prejudice against foreign nobles, Lucie. Our own aristocracy is bad enough, but—"

"He's discarded all that. He was never French except in name."

"You speak as though you'd known him for some time. Have you had secrets from me?"

"I have!" laughter dimpled in the girl's face. "For years and years! When I was in New York with father, before the war, we met him; he was visiting in Newport with college friends. Then, you know that father and I were in France when the war broke out—father was ill and almost helpless at the time, you remember. Gramont came to Paris to serve with his regiment, and met us there. He helped us get away, procured real money for us, got us passage to New York. He knows lots of our friends, and I've always been deeply grateful to him for his assistance then.

"We've corresponded quite frequently during the war," she pursued. "I mentioned him several times after we got home from France, but you probably failed to notice the name. It's only since he came to New Orleans that I really kept any secrets from you; this time I wanted to find out if you liked him."

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. His face was quite [illegible] of expression.

"Yes, yes," he said. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]."

[illegible]

ten or spoken rather frankly, perhaps. Also, Bob may have blabbed to him. Bob still drinks—prohibition has not hit him very hard!"

"No," agreed Fell, gravely. "Unfortunately, no. Lucie, I've discovered a most important fact. Joseph Maillard did not own any stock in the Bayou Oil company at the time your land was sold them by him, and he had no interest at all in the real estate concern that bought your St. Landry swamp lands and made a fortune off them. We have really blamed him most unjustly. I do not believe that he has profited in the least from you. His investments in the companies concerned were made afterward, and I am certain he sold the lands innocently."

Lucie drew a deep breath.

"I am glad you have said this," she returned simply. "It's been hard for me to think that Uncle Joseph had taken advantage of me; I think that he honestly likes me, as far as he permits himself to like anyone."

"He'd not loan you money on it," said Fell. "Friendship isn't a tangible security with him."

"Well, who really did profit by my loss? Anyone?"

Fell's pale gray eyes twinkled, then cleared in their usually wide innocence.

"My dear Lucie, is there one person in this world to whose faults Joseph Maillard is deliberately blind—one person to whom he would refuse nothing, in whom he would pardon everything, of whom he would never believe any evil report?"

"You mean—" Lucie drew a quick breath—"Bob?"

"Yes, I mean Bob. That he has profited by your loss I am not yet in a position to say; but I suspect it. When I have finished with the Masquer, I shall take up his trail."

Jachin Fell rose. "Now I must be off, my dear. "Will you dine with us tomorrow evening, Lucie? My mother commanded me to bring you as soon as possible—"

"Oh, your mother!" exclaimed the girl, contritely. "I was so absorbed in the Masquer that I forgot to ask after her. How is she?"

"Quite as usual, thank you."

"I'll come tomorrow night gladly, Uncle Jachin."

"And we'll take a look at the Proteus ball afterward, if you like. I'll send Ben Chacherre for you with the car, if you're not afraid of him."

"I'm not exactly afraid of him," Lucie responded, soberly, "but there is something about him that I can't like. I'm sorry that you're trying to regenerate him, in a way."

Fell shrugged lightly. "All life is an effort, little one! Well, goodby."

Jachin Fell left the house at three-forty. Twenty minutes later the bell rang again. Lucie sent one of the servants to admit Henry Gramont; she kept him waiting a full fifteen minutes before she appeared, and then she made no apologies whatever for the delay.

Not that Gramont minded waiting; he deemed it a privilege to linger in this house! He loved to study the place, so reflective of its owner. He loved the white Colonial mantel that surrounded the fireplace, perpetually alight, with its gleaming sheen of old brasses, and the glittering fire-set to one side. The very air of the place, the atmosphere that it breathed, was sweet to him.

The Napoleon bed that filled the bow window, with its pillows and soft coverings; the inlaid walnut cabinet made by Sheraton, with its quaintly curved glasses that reflected the old-time curios within; the tilt tables, the rosewood chairs, the rugs, bought before the oriental rug market was flooded with machine-made Senna knots—about everything here had an air of comfort, of long use, of restfulness. It was not the sort of place built up, raw item by raw item, by the color-frenzied hands of decorators. It was the sort of place that decorators strive desperately to imitate, and cannot.

When she made her appearance, Gramont bent over her hand and addressed her in French.

"You are charming as ever, Shining One! And in years to come you will be still more charming. That is the beauty of having a name taken direct from the classics and bestowed as a good fairy's gift—"

"Thank you, monsieur—but you have translated my name at least twenty times, and I am weary of hearing it," responded Lucie, laughingly.

"Poor taste, mademoiselle, to grow weary of such beauty!"

"Not of the name, but of your exegesis upon it. Why should I not be displeased? Last night you were positively rude, and now you decry my taste! Did you leave all your manners in France, M. le prince?"

"You ask [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]."

Special Care of Baby.

That Baby should have a bed of its own all are agreed. Yet it is more reasonable for an infant to sleep with grown-ups than to use a man's medicine in an attempt to regulate the delicate organism of that same infant. Either practice is to be shunned. Neither would be tolerated by specialists in children's diseases.

Your Physician will tell you that Baby's medicine must be prepared with even greater care than Baby's food.

A Baby's stomach when in good health is too often disarranged by improper food. Could you for a moment, then, think of giving to your ailing child anything but a medicine especially prepared for Infants and Children? Don't be deceived.

Make a mental note of this:—It is important, Mothers, that you should remember that to function well, the digestive organs of your Baby must receive special care. No Baby is so abnormal that the desired results may be had from the use of medicines primarily prepared for grown-ups.

TURNED JOKE ON MRS. GOULD

Occasion When Theatrical Manager Proved Himself Gifted With a Keen Sense of Humor.

"Mrs. George Gould," said a New York dramatist, "was a superb actress before her marriage, and she often entertained Augustin Daly, her old manager, at Georgian court

"One day as the Goulds and Daly were sauntering over the Lakewood gardens a little group of strangers drew timidly near

"'Pardon me, Mrs. Gould,' said one of the group, 'but we have heard so much about your wonderful hothouses—will you allow us to visit them?'

"Mrs. Gould nodded towards Daly mischievously.

"'Ask him,' she said.

"'Pardon me, Mr. Gould, but may we visit your hothouses?' the stranger repeated.

"Daly assumed a grand air.

"'Yes, yes, of course you may,' he said, 'and pluck just as many apricots and peaches as you like.'"

Bobbed Hair May Cause Baldness.

The fearful prospect of a nation of baldheaded women following in the wake of the bobbed hair craze has divided Washington beauty parlors into two bitter camps, while in the distance rumbles the thunder of an impending curling-iron war.

When hair is bobbed, it is explained, a tight hat usually is worn through which air does not reach the scalp, and which retards the growth of the hair.

In fact, it has been solemnly affirmed that the crowning glory, starved for ventilation, frequently gives up the battle and falls out.

Dream of Opulence.

A week before the Fourth of July, three-year-old Betty invested a quarter in fireworks, buying two boxes of victory snakes and a 15-cent package of sparklers. Every succeeding day she took them out and looked at them delightedly. On the morning of the Fourth, as she prepared to shoot them off, she said, wistfully: "Oh, muvver, I wisht I was a millionaire!"

"Well, Betty, why in the world do you wish that?" her mother asked.

"Why, if I was," exclaimed Betty, "I believe I'd jus' shoot off this very whole box of sparklers to once!"

With Ice Cream Cone in Sight, It Must Be Conceded That Betty Withdrew Gracefully.

Betty, who is four, had been scolded by auntie for some misdemeanor, and her feelings were badly hurt. She kept referring to the matter and saying to auntie: "All right for you. I don't care about you any more."

Finally aunty retorted: "Well, all right for you, then. If you don't care about me any more I won't need to get you that ice cream cone I intended to buy you."

Betty looked abashed for a moment. She did not wish to unbend so far as to accept a bribe, but she disliked to lose that ice cream cone.

Thirteen years ago, in August of 1909, the Frank Barney building adjoining The News office then used by Morris Curie for a restaurant burned to the ground. Eight years ago, on July 19, 1914, the big Barney-Curie fire occurred. And four years ago, on March 5, 1918, the Leighty Block was entirely destroyed by fire. Could there be a firebug around, desirous for a fire to occur every four or five years, be suspected of starti'g these disasters? We hope not. Every one of these fires started at a late hour when everybody would be in bed.

Calls were sent to surrounding towns for help when they thought the fire would spread. Spencerville was the first to respond, and while it has no fire-fighting apparatus, its men aided greatly in the fight. Hicksville sent several auto loades of men equipped with buckets who reached here in time to be of great aid. The Auburn Company had been called to Hamilton to fight a fire which destroyed several buildings in the business district, about one hour before they received our call, and they could not come. After some telephone difficulty word was sent to Garrett, aud its company made a wild chase here but were too late to do much good. The Butler Company arrived shortly after the Garrett truck. The St. Joe Fire Department and the town are very grateful to these towns for their ready response.

The entire loss caused is roughly estimated at $8, 400. Mrs. Kagey is the heaviest looser to the amount of $5.500. The other losses are estimated as follows:

Charles Rice	$1.000
E. P. Brown	800
Mrs. Ada Berry	300
Champ Bailey	200
Paul Curie	100
Leslie Meek	400
Reece Brothers	75
H. G. Bursh	25

Part of these losses were from damages done to furniture when it was removed from the homes.

Mrs. Berry is the only one who was carrying fire insurance and her loss will be covered.

Mr. Rice has moved his stuff into the school room in the Leighty Block where he will conduct business until different arrangements can be made. Browne goods were stored in his home and in a shed at the rear of the Reece lot until they can find, if possible, a room to start up again. Mr. Meek moved his barber equipment to his home. He is contemplating on building soon.

Saturday St. Joe attracted hundreds of visitors who came from far and near to view the ruins. A stream of automobiles poured in and out throughout the day.

Word of the loss was sent to Mrs. Kagey at Warsaw, but no reply has been made. She will be encouraged to rebuild, but if she refuses it is hardly probable that a new building will be started on the grounds before next year.

The points of interest they visited were, Kalamasoo, Grand Rapids, Stanwood, Big Rapids, Reed City, Manistee, Benzonia, Silver Lake, Petoskey, Crooked Lake which is 483 miles from home, Mackinaw, Traverse City where they visited a Silver Fox farm and saw 125 of the animals, Elk Rapids, Charlevoix, The Straits near Cheboygan, Otsego Lake where they found mosquitos, Cadallac, Tustin, and several other towns and lakes. In all they drove about 1100 miles.

CUTS TRAVEL ABUSES

No More Jaunts in Vacation at Expense of Government.

Uncle Sam Clamps Down the Lid on Government Railroad Travel Vouchers—Saving of Many Millions Being Effected.

Washington.—There will be no merry skylarking this summer by Uncle Sam's army of workers at seashore and mountain tops at government expense.

Your Uncle Sam has put a crimp in free travel abuses. The lid has been clamped on government railroad travel vouchers. In other years thousands have flocked to the summer resorts on the easily procured travel slips.

The young "swell" or "pretty doll" on the government payroll in the old days ran the gamut of "business" excuses, and drew free travel checks besides the usual per diem allowance for subsistence while absent from Washington.

Later on the usual thirty days annual vacation leave with pay allowed government workers was utilized to drive dull care away.

Now, however, under a rigid economy drive, useless travel by government officials or employees of any rank is forbidden.

Bureau chiefs are held responsible strictly for abuses of the free travel privilege. It is effecting a saving to the treasury of many millions of dollars annually.

Treasury experts declare that in preceding years the government outlay for this purpose was something in the nature of a scandal. Every government department has its corps of special investigators and experts, many of whom want to gallop at will at government expense.

Until recently officials complained that the hardest work performed by some of this class was that of drawing their semi-monthly pay.

The efficiency and economy program has done much to speed up work, and to eliminate waste time and waste motion. Under reorganization plans government workers do not find idleness such a joy as in the days of old.

This has come through the program of reducing the bureaus to normal strength. It has meant a lot of trimming in personnel. Still a lot more will be done before peace time basis is reached.

SAVES 600 CHILDREN

Miss Anna L. Daniels, one of the first young women from the United States, to volunteer for relief work in the Near East will return to America shortly after having personally saved 600 children in three years.

Since 1919 she has been at Trebizond, the ancient camel terminus on the Black sea, aiding and collecting orphan children.

Miss Daniels is the daughter of the late Charles H. Daniels of Framingham, Mass. Her mother who resides in Tolland, Conn., is president of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions.

Allentown, Pa.—Oscar M. Schierer, fifty-five years of age, who died here the other day, leaves an estate of $50,000, accumulated through his efforts in business during the last forty years, despite the fact that during the entire time he was unable to move from his chair. Schierer, crippled from rheumatism, conducted his business and built it up to a prosperous condition, notwithstanding the handicap of his infirmity.

Bandit Amused Child As Pals Rob Father

With her father and his clerk bound and gagged nearby, three-year-old Sarah Auster laughed merrily as one bandit played with her while three others rifled her daddy's jewelry store in New York city. She gave up the game reluctantly when the quartet fled with several thousand dollars' worth of loot.

The little girl watched with interest while the bandits bound and gagged her father and his clerk. Then, twirling his watch, one robber said: "You come and play with me, kiddie," and she did so until the job had been completed and the robbers had left with their loot.

An "S. O. S." call flashed to Near East Relief workers in every part of Indiana pleads for heroic service in an effort to raise $50,000 by June 30, the end of the fiscal year.

"That is a large sum but we must have it," said Ed Jackson, state chairman of the Near East Relief, "for every dollar we get now is tied up in the life of a little child."

Although substantial gains in contributions to Armenian orphan relief have been made in the last few months, Indiana is still $50,000 short of what the committee considers a minimum goal for the year. Thousands of innocent children are doomed to certain death by starvation as a result of a cut in relief appropriations made necessary by lagging donations, the relief committee explains.

In a letter to relief treasurers and workers sent over the signature of Thomas C. Day, state treasurer of Near East Relief funds, it is pointed out how Indiana can help in averting the worst tragedy since the World war. Mr. Day puts the situation thus: "If we can cover this $50,000 deficit before July 1, I shall feel that Indiana will have done a fair share toward revoking the death sentence in effect passed upon several thousand orphans by the recent cut made by our executive committee in appropriations to relief work."

Very often it is said that a cross bred hog makes a better feeder than a pure-bred animal, but William Plessinger, southwest of Rushville, has had experience that shows that it does not always prove out that way. In fact he has fed out two bunches of hogs that proved the statement does not always hold true.

On April 12 he sold a bunch of fall pigs that were farrowed the latter part of August, among which were thirteen head of pure-bred Poland and Durocs. According to his report the thirteen pure-breds averaged 250 pounds, while the cross-breds averaged only 210 pounds, a difference of 40 pounds in favor of the pure-bred hog.

According to Mr. Plessinger's statement regarding his experience with feeding these hogs, there was not more than 10 days difference between the first and last litters farrowed, and in fact the majority of the cross-breeders were among the first litters farrowed.

AUGUST

Seen and Heard In Indiana

Kendallville.—The thirtieth annual reunion of former soldiers and sailors in northeastern Indiana will be held at Mount Pisgah August 19.

Decatur.—Governor McCray and Ed Jackson, secretary of state, have accepted an invitation from the citizens of Decatur to attend the Indiana Yeoman day celebration in Decatur on August 22. They will make addresses.

Marion.—Signs bearing the words, "Go Slow and See Our City and Go Fast and See Our Jail," are to be placed at the various street intersections of Gas City. This is the result of the city council declaring war on automobile speeders. Fifteen miles an hour was announced as the speed limit for autoists while driving through Gas City.

Noblesville.—The commissioners of Hamilton county have taken steps to stop the payment of what they regard as excessive fees to attorneys who prepare and file petitions for the improvements of roads. Recently the board refused to pay two claims of $500 each for services given by lawyers on two different roads, and later both cases were compromised for $300 each.

Indianapolis.—A total of $610,353.87 was spent from public funds by township trustees acting as overseers of the poor for outdoor relief during the last fiscal year ending December 31, 1921, according to a report made public by Amos Butler, secretary to the board of state charities. This is the largest amount of money ever expended for such aid in the history of the board of state charities, according to Mr. Butler.

Indianapolis.—The state board of tax commissioners intends to stand squarely behind its appraisement increase recommendations made to a number of counties recently, John J. Brown, chairman of the board, and William A. Hough, member, said. The comments were occasioned by information that a number of county boards of review are refusing to carry out the recommendations for increases in tax appraisements.

Indianapolis.—Indiana's 1922 corn crop will produce approximately 4,500,000 bushels more than the 1921 crop, says the crop estimate given in the monthly crop report of George C. Bryant, statistician for the co-operative crop reporting service for Indiana. The estimated production of wheat, oats, rye and barley show a slight decrease over the estimate of last month, but the estimate on the corn crop increased approximately 3,500,000 bushels, the report said.

Greenfield.—The board of county commissioners, in session here, granted an Indianapolis electrical firm permission to erect a radio receiving set in the courthouse as an experiment, to see whether or not radio programs from broadcasting stations will draw people from the surrounding country into Greenfield in greater numbers. The experiment will be conducted without cost to the county and, if successful, the set will probably be bought and a municipal receiving station established.

South Bend.—Disregarding action of the state board of tax commissioners, which "recommended" an 11 per cent increase in the valuation of South Bend real estate, the St. Joseph county board of review has refused to follow the request, insisting that assessments made by the Portage township assessor are too high by 10 per cent. If there is an increase in the valuation of South Bend property, it will not be with the consent of the county board. The state has authority to back up its recommendation with an order.

Evansville.—Flour mills and grain elevators in the Indiana "pocket" report that wheat deliveries are unusually heavy for this time of the year and many of the elevators are filled. Millers say that they cannot recall a year when farmers disposed of their grain more liberally than they have this year. It is believed that by the first of October little wheat will be left in the hands of the farmers in the tristate district. The flour mills report an increase of business and say that as soon as the railroad and coal miners' strikes are over trade should show a big improvement.

Anderson.—John W. McClung, physical director of the Anderson Young Men's Christian association, and president of Indiana Y. M. C. A. Physical Directors' association, has issued the program for the annual meeting of the association at Evansville, September 7 and 8. [illegible]

Wabash.—Four hundred students have finished the summer term at Manchester college at North Manchester. Many of them will take up teaching in the fall.

Greenfield.—The Hancock county board of education has placed a ban on "flappers" as teachers and went on record as opposed to "ultra-stylish" dress and the use of rouge among the women teachers and smoking by the men.

Columbus.—Corncobs are being used for fuel by the Mutual Ice and Coal company of Columbus and by the Porter Heating and Light company of Hope, in an effort to conserve a dwindling coal supply caused by the nation-wide strikes of miners and railroad shopmen.

Nashville.—Brown county farmers are picking the finest peach crop in the history of the county, according to growers. The crop is large and of excellent quality, the average diameter of the fruit in the Bessire orchard, near Nashville, being between four and five inches.

Fort Wayne.—Fort Wayne is facing an acute shortage of building supplies. Unless the situation is relieved within a short time by shipments of cement, there can be no building of any kind started after two or three weeks, heads of building supply concerns said. Shortage of coal at the cement mills is given as the cause.

Indianapolis.—The state highway commission opened bids on ten bridges, estimated to cost about $120,000, and on approximately 13 miles of highway. Bids on approximately nine miles of the highways and on three of the bridges were above the estimates of highway department engineers and will, therefore, be rejected. New bids will be solicited.

Jeffersonville.—Reports by Bert Wheedon, traffic manager for the Interstate Public Service company, show that approximately 100,000 crates of berries were moved this season in interurban cars by that company to Indianapolis from the berry patches of Clark, Floyd and Scott counties. The harvest is the largest ever handled so expeditiously, it is said.

Washington, D. C.—According to government statistics made public recently Indiana ranks eighth among the healthiest states in the Union. The expectation of life in the state is 56.84 years for men and 57.45 for women. The statistics were gathered by the census bureau in 1920. The longest-lived people in the United States are in Kansas.

Terre Haute.—The Vigo county board of review, in special session, refused to make certain increases on assessments of real estate and on personal property in the county, as was recommended by the state board of tax commissioners. The action was taken by a unanimous vote, the members of the board feeling that the assessments in the county already represented the true cash value of the property.

Jeffersonville.—On account of accumulated street work which requires attention and because of the necessity of increasing the police and fire departments—the latter on account of the new two-platoon system—and also because, it is said, the outgoing council last fall made inadequate provision for running the city government, the Jefferson city council adopted preliminary resolutions for a tax levy of $1.30, an increase of 20 cents over last year, when the rate was cut 30 cents.

Petersburg.—Farmers are cutting their third crop of alfalfa. All three crops have been above the average and the total yield will exceed five tons to the acre. A fourth cutting will be made late in September. Farmers have begun plowing for wheat. The corn crop will be the largest in the history of Pike county, notwithstanding that hundreds of acres of corn land in the Patoka and White river bottoms stood idle this year. Most farmers are holding wheat for higher prices.

Indianapolis.—The increased cost of education to taxpayers in Indiana is due to the lengthening of the school year, increased public school attendance, decreased purchasing power of the dollar, large increases in the expenditure for new school buildings after the war, rapid growth in school transportation [illegible]

BETTER ROADS

MINIMUM WIDTH OF HIGHWAY

Hard-Surface Roads Should Be at Least Eighteen Feet Wide for Safety of All Concerned.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A minimum width of 18 feet for hard-surface roads is recommended by the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture. The maximum width of truck body generally permitted is 8 feet, and 5½ feet is the ordinary clearance width of automobiles. At an average speed of 30 miles an hour it is unreasonable to expect the driver of an automobile to drive with the wheels closer than 1½ feet to the edge of the pavement, says the bureau. For trucks at an average speed of 15 miles an hour, this distance should not be less than 1½ feet on account of the great width of the rear wheel. Three feet seems to be a minimum safe clearance between bodies. Inasmuch as a certain amount of truck traffic is to be expected on all main country roads, the minimum width of surface should be 18 feet to provide these clearances when an automobile meets a truck.

Sheridan-Big Horn Road in Wyoming Before and After Improvement.

Where the frequency with which trucks pass each other becomes a big factor, as in the neighborhood of large cities, the minimum width of pavement should be 20 feet to provide a clearance of 3½ feet and a safe distance of wheels from edge of pavement.

ALLOW FOR FUTURE TRAFFIC

Count of Automobiles on Number of Roads in Tennessee Shows Surprising Fact.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In building a road liberal allowance should be made for future increase in traffic, says the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture. A traffic count conducted by the bureau in co-operation with Tennessee officials on a number of roads in Davison county, in which Nashville is located, shows surprising facts when compared with a similar count in 1916. During this period automobile registrations have doubled, while the number of motor vehicles on the roads is five times as great as in 1916. In 1916 horse-drawn and motor-vehicle traffic were almost equal in volume. In 1921 horse-drawn traffic had increased only slightly in volume and constituted 16 per cent of the traffic, motor vehicles constituting 84 per cent.

Observations in this and other countries lead to the conclusion that volume of traffic may increase in much greater proportion than the number of motor vehicles and will also depend to a large degree on the condition of improvement of the road and on the economic conditions in the adjacent territory.

Sunday School Lesson

(By REV. P. B. FITZWATER, D. D., Teacher of English Bible in the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.)

Copyright, 1922, Western Newspaper Union.

LESSON FOR AUGUST 20.

SECOND RETURN FROM EXILE

LESSON TEXT—Ezra 7:1-8:36.

GOLDEN TEXT—The hand of our God is upon all them that seek him, for good.—Ezra 8:22.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Ezra 9:1-10:17.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Ezra's Prayer for Help.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Ezra's Prayer for Help on a Journey.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Ezra: Teacher and Leader.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Religious Teachers: A Need and an Opportunity.

I. The Leader—Ezra (7:1-10).

1. Who he was (vv. 1-6). (1) A priest (vv. 1-5). The leader of the first company was Zerubbabel, a sort of military governor. The great need now was for a religious leader, for the people had gone far from God, as we see from the noble reforms which Ezra effected. (2) A ready scribe (v. 6). He was a teacher of the law of God.

2. His high ambition (vv. 7-10). (1) "He set his heart to seek the law of the Lord" (v. 10). He definitely set out with the noble purpose to know God's Word. To be successful in anything one must set out with a purpose. Daniel was a success because he "purposed in his heart." Ministers and Sunday-school teachers should have this set purpose. (2) He set his heart to obey the Lord (v. 10). He was not only concerned with knowing God's Word, but to obey it. God's Word cannot fully be known by the intellect; it must be experienced. The essential qualification for a teacher of the Bible, a preacher or Sunday-school teacher, is obedience to God's Word. (3) He set his heart to teach Israel God's statutes and judgments (v. 10). He not only had a love for God's Word, but a desire to implant it in the hearts of others. When one has an experiential knowledge of God's Word he longs to teach it to others.

3. His commission (7:11-26). The king Artaxerxes gave him a copy of the decree authorizing him to lead a company back to Jerusalem. He was empowered (1) to collect funds (vv. 15, 16); (2) to levy tribute (vv. 21, 22); (3) to appoint magistrates and judges (v. 25); (4) to execute penalties (v. 26). So great was the king's confidence in Ezra that he gave all these powers into his hand. For this great honor Ezra lifted his heart to God in thanksgiving. He was mainly concerned with the fact that he was to beautify the Lord's house and acknowledge that God had put this purpose into the king's heart.

II. The Company (8:1-20).

The company was small—only 1,754 males, but including women, children and servants, there were perhaps 6,000 to 7,000 people in this caravan.

III. Ezra's Prayer and Fasting (8:21-23).

The first thing he did was to seek God's guidance. Not only God's leaders, but all Christians should seek divine guidance and help in every undertaking—every new journey, every piece of new work, every business adventure, every relationship. That which we cannot invoke God's blessing upon should not be undertaken. Further, success can only be realized when God's blessing is upon us. He did not minimize the dangers attending such a journey, but he had told the king that the hand of the Lord would be upon all for good who sought him, and now he was ashamed to ask the king for a military escort to protect them from the marauding Arabs.

IV. The Successful Journey (8:24-32).

God heard their prayer. The treasure entrusted to them was great. Perhaps the entire value of all the money, etc., was [illegible] For a weak caravan to go on a [illegible] four months [illegible] these robber bands carrying such an amount of money was most perilous; but Ezra [illegible] and would [illegible]

She alone is mistress of her art who has nothing left to throw away.

GOOD THINGS TO "PUT UP"

It is pleasant to try some well-recommended recipes, without slighting those which have long been used in the family, for sometimes we find one which we like so well that it is added to the sacred family cook book.

Plum Catsup.—Take one-half peck of blue plums, one pint of vinegar, half the weight of the plums in sugar—less if liked less sweet. Add a tablespoonful each of cloves, cinnamon and allspice, tied in a muslin cloth. Boil together, strain through a colander and boil again until of the right consistency.

Apple and Pepper Sauce.—Cut no ripe, tart apples in thick slices, place in layers with sliced green peppers using one-half dozen peppers to one dozen apples; and over each layer sprinkle salt, using one-half cupful. Tie in a muslin cloth one teaspoonful of crushed cloves, mace, peppercorns and nasturtium seed, one cupful of sugar and three pints of vinegar; pour boiling hot over the apples six mornings. Then seal.

Chili Sauce.—Boil together five cupfuls of vinegar, two tablespoonfuls of salt and one cupful of sugar, then add twenty-four large ripe tomatoes, three red peppers, and seven onions, all put through the meat grinder. Cook one hour, bottle and seal.

Green Apples and Onions.—Slice green apples, using a dozen apples to three good-sized onions, cook the onions in a little fat until somewhat soft, then add the apples unpeeled; cook until nearly done, then add a little sugar, salt and a dash of cayenne. Serve as a vegetable with pork chops or steak.

Canning Young Beets.—Wash and trim, leaving two inches of stem on each to keep them from bleeding. Cook until tender, skin and place in jars with two tablespoonfuls of sugar to each quart, and one teaspoonful of salt. Set jars into a kettle of water and seal, not tight; cook in the water for an hour. Seal and set in the cellar for winter use.

> The best things are nearest—breath in your nostrils, light in your eyes, flowers at your feet, duties at your hand, the path of God just before you. Then do not grasp at the stars, but do life's plain, common work as it comes, certain that daily duties and daily bread are the sweetest things of life.—Lord Houghton.

SEASONABLE GOOD THINGS

Now spring chicken is low enough to be indulged in occasionally. Cut the chicken up as for frying, put it into a deep Scotch kettle with a few tablespoonfuls of water, cover tightly and steam for a few minutes, add a little fat and a tablespoonful of water from time to time; season well and cook until brown. The chicken will be tender and juicy with this slow cooking.

Stuffed Steak.—Grind a pound of round of beef through the meat grinder (season with salt, pepper and onion) with one egg. Prepare a bread stuffing as for poultry, grease gem pans, put in a layer of the meat, then of the dressing and lastly a layer of the meat. Bake and turn out on small plates and garnish with parsley.

Currant Pie.—Take one cupful of crushed ripe currants, one cupful of sugar, two egg yolks, a pinch of salt two tablespoonfuls of flour and one of cold water. Cook until smooth and thick. Cool and fill a baked shell. Cover with a meringue made of the two egg whites with three tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar; dot with half a [illegible] marshmallows and brown [illegible] in the oven. If currants [illegible] and put on fresh with sugar [illegible] of the fruit will be sufficient for a pie.

DOG AND CAT

"The collie dog and the angora cat were talking," said Daddy.

"I must tell you what they were talking about," he added, and both Nick and Nancy said at once:

"Oh yes, Daddy, please do!"

"The collie dog was very beautiful. The angora cat was very beautiful, too.

"They both belonged to the same mistress and they had a very happy home. They got along very well together, too.

"'I saw such a strange thing today,' said the collie dog.

"'Did you?' inquired the angora cat, in a most polite way. 'Tell me, won't you, what you saw that was so strange?'

"'I'm merely hinting for an invitation to tell it,' the collie dog grinned.

"'I'm waiting to hear,' said the cat, 'for then I have something I want to tell you.'

"'Good,' said the dog. 'Well, I will proceed.'

"'What is that you are going to do?' asked the cat.

"'Proceed,' repeated the dog.

"'And what may that be?' inquired the cat.

"'That means that I will start,' said the dog.

"'Oh, oh, me-ow, me-ow, now I see,' said the cat.

"'Do proceed,' the cat now asked with a grin.

"'I was out on the street today,' the dog commenced, 'and I saw two ladies. They weren't old and they weren't so very young.

"Do Proceed," the Cat Now Asked.

"'By that I mean they were quite, quite grown-up. But they were acting like children.

"'They were hopping on one foot and then on the other. They were waiting for a trolley car and they seemed to enjoy hopping a bit.'

"'Well,' said the cat, 'I suppose their feet hadn't grown up as much as the rest of them.'

"'That must have been the reason for it,' said the dog. 'Anyway, I watched them. I put my head on one side and then on the other and I said to myself:

"'"This is very curious. How strangely they are behaving. This isn't just the thing to do—for grown-ups to be hopping like that."

"'Well, they saw me as I was watching them. Of course then I looked away for I didn't want to be rude.

"'They laughed then and one of them said:

"'"Did you see that dog look at us? He looked at us just as though he were a person and as though he thought this behavior was rather strange. But as though, too, he should look away when he saw we noticed him."

"'They seemed much amused by the way I had been looking at them, but I was much amused at the way they were acting.

"'But now, cat, tell me your story. I have told you of my strange experience, for I do think it was a strange sight and I think it was amusing to see that the people thought it was so funny I should look at them as a person would. They evidently thought me lacking in any powers of observation.'

"'What are powers of observation?' asked the cat.

"'Powers of seeing things and noticing them carefully,' said the dog. 'But gracious me, bow-wow, I want to hear what you have to tell me.'

CROPS ALL GOOD

Western Canada Farmers Jubilant Over Prospects.

Harvest in Southwestern Manitoba Expected to Come Close to Bumper Yield of 1915.

Those who have friends in Western Canada will be anxious to learn of the conditions there, and will be interested in knowing that generally the crop prospect is very favorable. Cutting and harvesting have become general, and it is anticipated that the results which will appear when thrashing is completed will be highly satisfactory.

With the widely varying weather conditions that have prevailed in the different sections of the prairie provinces it would be impossible to forecast with any degree of accuracy as to how the crop is made. The Manitoba crop has held its own, and the outlook for the province as a whole is decidedly good.

With the exception of an area south and west of Brandon, grain crops in Manitoba continue to give promises of a good harvest, the best in fact for a number of seasons, reports the Canadian National Railways for the week ended July 22. Recent rains and favorable temperatures have improved conditions wonderfully.

Southwestern Manitoba will reap a harvest which will nearly equal the bumper harvest of 1915. Farmers in the district are very optimistic. The rye crop is exceptionally good; many fields will yield upwards of 30 bushels per acre. The fields are remarkably free of weeds, and the grasshopper menace, which has been evident in the southwestern portion of the province for the past three years, has been almost entirely obliterated. No damage has been done to the wheat crop by rust, and the oats crop will average more than 60 bushels to the acre.

In Saskatchewan there are large areas where the crops are excellent. In places where the prospects some few weeks ago were not encouraging, material change for the better is apparent. In these places unusually dry weather during a portion of the growing season kept the crops back, but what was most remarkable was the effect that the spring moisture had. While light in some places, this moisture kept sufficient strength in the growing crops to ensure a fair yield of a good quality of grain. This condition arises in the mid-central districts of the province.

The southern portions of the province have been exceptionally favored, reports showing that the yield of all grains will be wonderfully good.

The crops of all Saskatchewan are a week or ten days later than those of Manitoba.

Conditions in Alberta are said to be good, especially in southern Alberta, where copious and plentiful showers came in time to give assurance of good paying yields. This applies to nearly all sections of that district.

Northern Alberta, or at least that portion of it lying within thirty miles of Edmonton, has suffered from lack of moisture, a very unusual thing for that district, where there is generally an abundance. As a result, the heavy yields of wheat, oats and barley for which the district is noted will show considerable falling off over past years. The grain, though, is of excellent quality and the yield will be fair.

Pasturage is poor, and the hay crop will fall short of that of any previous year for quite an extended period.

On the whole, the prairie provinces of Western Canada will have a crop that will warrant the statement that it will prove satisfactory and remunerative.

A number of farmers put in corn this year, and from present appearances there is a likelihood of an abundant yield for fodder and ensilage, while a good deal of it will fully mature. A number of silos were erected this season. While grain growing is losing none of its interest, it is highly pleasing to note the number of farmers who are adding dairying to the grain growing industry.—Advertisement.

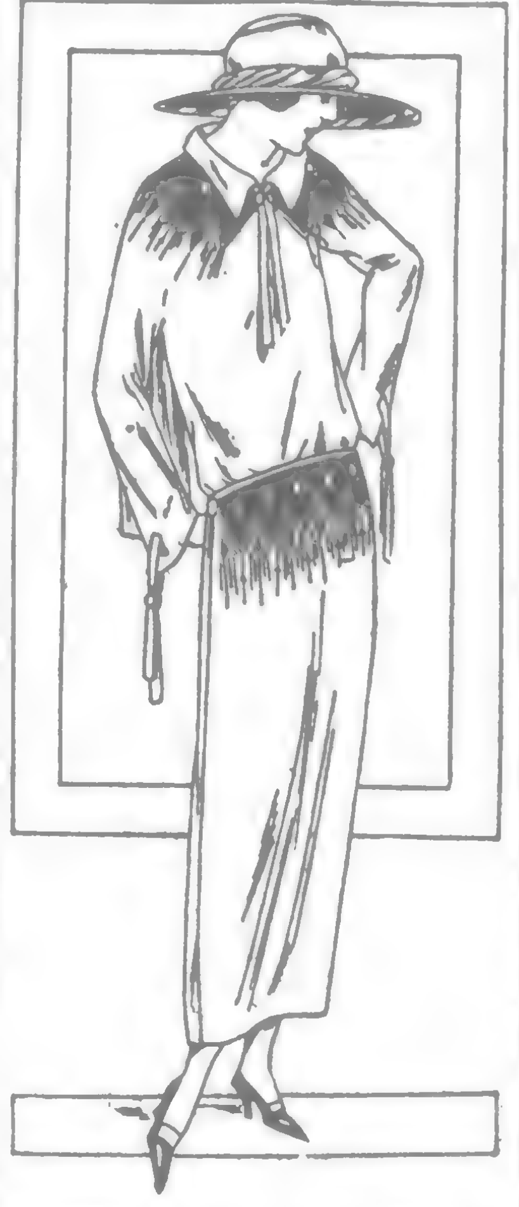
To Concentrate on the Sleeves

We hear all sorts of rumors about the sleeves that are to come—whether they shall be tight or loose, flowing or plain—but always it is the sleeve, it seems, around which the clothes interest centers, observes a fashion writer in the New York Times. Collars, skirts, bodices and waistbands keep their own importance in the scheme of things, but sleeves remain, still, the center of attraction.

There is no known fabric, no known method of trimming, no clever adornment for feminine attractiveness that has not been applied to the scheme of sleeve construction and with the utmost success as a result. Each woman who at all prides herself upon her dressing as a mark of distinction for her personality pays much attention to the manner of the shaping of her sleeves. There is where the art of the modern gown is concentrated. By the swing and sweep of the sleeve is the style of the frock established. The sleeve, by all odds, carries off the bulk of attention. And so it shall be during the coming season—so the designers have decreed, if their advance models are to be taken as any criterion.



Afternoon Frock of Silver Lace and an Underlying Area of Gray Georgette Tucked in Group for Trimming.

By their sleeves ye shall know them. That is the new style slogan. The rest of the gown may be so simple that it is absolutely devoid of interest. It may cleave to the common level in every other particular, but as for its sleeves, there it excels. Sleeves are the importance of any gown. They are the points by which you tell at once whether it is in the class of the ultra smart or not. They may be plain, indeed, but they somehow manage to place themselves as the center around which all interest revolves. That is their distinction in the modern plan of dress.

To Be in Height of Fashion.

So, see to your sleeves if you would be "in the swim" of fashion. Do not allow them to sink to the level of mediocrity. They are your banners of fashion. And no matter whether their folds sweep into the soup, they still must carry that gracefulness which is so essential a part of the frocks that are new. The sleeve has only just begun to evolve. It promises, during the coming season to establish a real style interest never before achieved in exactly the ratio that this sleeve era shall attain. So, what could be more of fashion interest than to study the sleeve as it exists today, with an eye to its evolution in the future?

In one model there is used a combination of white against black kasha cloth. Then to join the two together there are rows of handwork in embroidery done with black threads. But it is in the sleeves that the real design converges. They are simple enough to be sure, but they carry with them that certain style which marks them as an insistent part of the modern era.

The blouse of this particular dress is cut in the kimono fashion that is so dear to the heart of the French. But the sleeves slope away in a very informal manner and then they are tied together with a band of the white kasha cloth made to form a sort of a tassel. They are inconspicuous enough, but they have that certain air of being the points of interest that dignify the gown as a portion of the season's mode. Again at the neckline the band is used to tie the collar together, and these three ties serve to form a pattern that draws the whole design of the garment into one.

The hat is white, as one might expect, and it is faced with a band of [illegible]

[illegible] Sleeves.

The [illegible] of this gown and [illegible] enough to run into a sort of drooping effect at the back which, when the arms are loosely hung at the side, form a capelike look across the back in spite of the fact that they are veritable sleeves when the arms are posed at other angles.

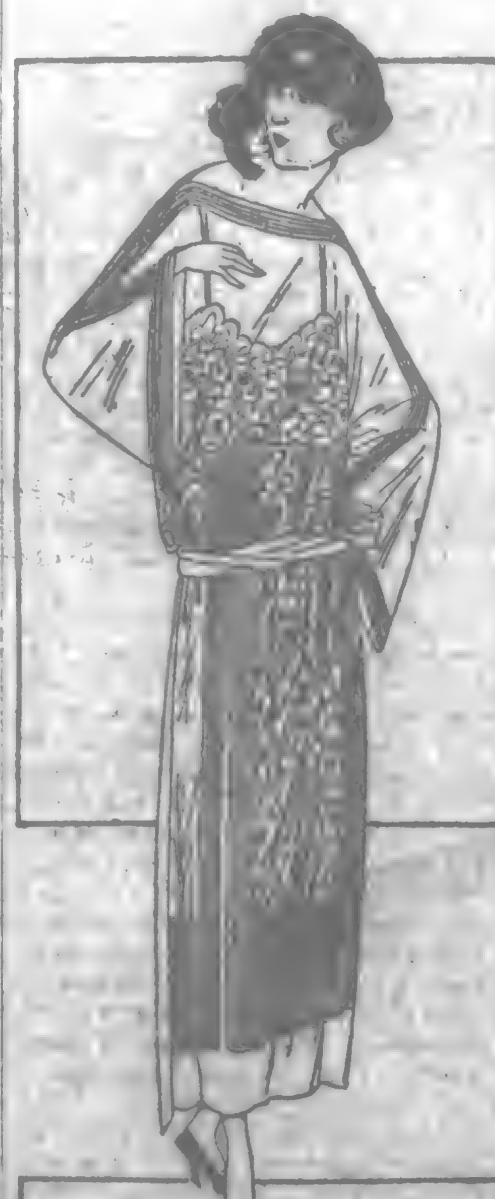
This is one of the happy parts of the modern sleeve. Besides being a sleeve, it is usually something else. They, together, form a cape, a scarf, a collar or what not? They are, only to begin with, sleeves, but they usually have some other function to perform in the design of the gown considered as a whole. There are sleeves which reach into side draperies for the skirt. And this they do most effectively.

For instance, there is a dress of brocaded silk in gray. It is straight enough and plain enough by itself. But then there are the sleeves. They are folded and draped and flung over the arms and when the chiffon has finished making sleeves to be worshiped for their very beauty then it takes itself into the skirt where it is draped and folded to such an extent that it makes the real interest of that skirt. Of course the drapery congregates at the sides and at the hem it falls in points over the hemline. But the sleeves are the things which start the idea and from them the folds of the skirt take their way in unalloyed enjoyment. To finish the gown there is a wide band of silver lace to make the girdle and then there is a chou of violet flowers made of chiffon posed at one side to finish off the girdle. On the whole it is a notable gown, in perfect harmony with the style of the present mode, but after all, its sleeves are the central points of interest. From them the draperies that make the gown distinctive emerge, and in them are the lines that establish the continuity of the shaping of the gown itself.

For Afternoon Dresses.

For afternoon dresses the sleeves are of just as much importance as they are for any other sort of frock. In fact they are more so, if the truth were faced. Afternoon frocks must, of necessity, be graceful and, just now, without flowing sleeves there is no chance of achieving a graceful frock without that side addition that makes a sort of sleeve drapery.

There is another frock. It is composed of gray georgette, combined with wide applications of silver lace. And it is a gown that is notable so far as its sleeves are concerned. The sleeves and the upper section of the bodice make a pattern with the groups of tucks that are so arranged that they string along the sleeves and then across the neck. Other than that there are only layers of the silver lace which stretch over the foundation of the same chiffon. But who can say that the sleeves are not the interest of the design of the gown? The lace is the trimming. Oh, yes, to be sure. But the foundation frock is accentuated by the rows of tucks that stretch across the front and the back of the bodice and then down the sleeves and across their edges to make a design of simplicity by which the whole tone of the frock is established.



One of Lanvin's Latest Street Costumes. It Is a Combination of White Kasha Cloth With Draped Sleeves.

On some of the newer summer dresses there are seen sleeves that are long and tightly fitted. They are mostly of lace or of some "transparent" material, and [illegible]

What Did He Mean?

An Indianapolis newspaper man stood trembling before his friends. He had just been married.

"But why did you go to Chicago to be married?" inquired one of the tormentors.

"Well, you see," he stammered, "I enlisted in the World war in Chicago."

IN LINE WITH BOLSHEVISM

Parallel Drawn by H. G. Wells Is Pretty Good Explanation of Existing Situation.

H. G. Wells was discussing bolshevism.

"It's too bad," he said, "for, after all, the bolsheviks meant well. But they went too far, you see. That's our trouble everywhere. Either we don't go far enough, or else we go too far.

"Like the man in the French restaurant.

"This poor devil looked at the French menu, which was Greek to him, and then he touched an item with his finger. The waiter brought him a plate of soup.

"Well and good. His soup finished, he touched the next item. The waiter brought him a second plate of soup. With a repressed oath he touched the third item, and a third plate of soup was set before him.

"In desperation then he touched the last item of all.

"The waiter brought him toothpicks."

His Reward.

"John Jurdan is dead at the age of eighty-two," said Timrod Tarpy. "For many years he walked quietly along the straight and narrow way, harming nobody, running over no one, shoving none out of it, and now and then pulling some weaker brother back into the path. He paid for everything when he bought it, minded his own business, and was not inquisitive about the affairs of others. He never gossiped, and always did his duty as he saw it. Consequently, a good many people suspected him of playing a smooth game of some sort, and the rest regarded him as a slow-going old fogy with no great amount of sense, and to prove it called him 'Uncle Johnny' during the last thirty-five or forty years of his life."—Kansas City Star.

Impossible.

She was sitting out the village dance when a well meaning but rather rustic youth saw a spider running over her lace collar. "Permit me," he murmured, as he bent to remove it.

"How dare you speak to me without an introduction?" she said witheringly.

At this point the spider reached her neck, and suddenly she cried, "Oh take it off! Please take it off!"

The young fellow only said, "I couldn't think of it, miss. I haven't been introduced to the spider."—London Transcript.

The Proof.

The Flitterbys had but recently returned from their honeymoon and taken possession of their new home.

Said Mr. Flitterby one evening, as he glanced about the dining room: "Do you know, my dear, I can scarcely realize that we are really and truly married?"

"In that case," returned Mrs. Flitterby with a wicked smile, "just look over these bills, darling, and you'll have no doubt whatever."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

ALWAYS TIRED NO AMBITION

Nervous and Dizzy, Everything Seemed to Worry Me. How I Got Well

Larwill, Indiana.—"My back was so bad I could not do my washing. I was always tired out and had no ambition, was nervous and dizzy and everything seemed to worry me and I had awful pains in my right side. I felt badly about four years and could not do my work as it should have been done. I saw Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound advertised so much and it did so many people good that I began to take it myself. I am feeling fine now and every one tells me they never saw me looking so well. I live on a farm, do all my work, and have three little girls to take care of. I am recommending this medicine to my friends and know it will help them if they use it like I do." — Mrs. HERBERT LONG, R. R. 3, Box 7, Larwill, Indiana.

Many women keep about their work when it is a great effort. They are always tired out and have no ambition. When you are in this condition give it prompt attention.

Take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, for it is especially adapted to correct such troubles, as it did for Mrs. Long.

Ban On Flappers

The Hancock county board of education at Greenfield has placed a ban on "flappers" as teachers and has gone on record as opposed ultra-stylish dress and use of rouge among the women teachers and smoking by the men.

Resolutions adopted by the board this week condemned smoking of cigars and required that no teacher indulge in cigaretts.

They also opposed teachers wearing bobbed hair and required that "if any have been so unfortunate as to have had their hair bobbed, they shall devise some scheme to do their hair up with nets, or otherwise, while in the school room. Women teachers are requested to be conservative in the use of rouge.

The board also resolved that it was opposed to the attendance of public dances by teachers of the county and require that teachers abstain from such attendance.

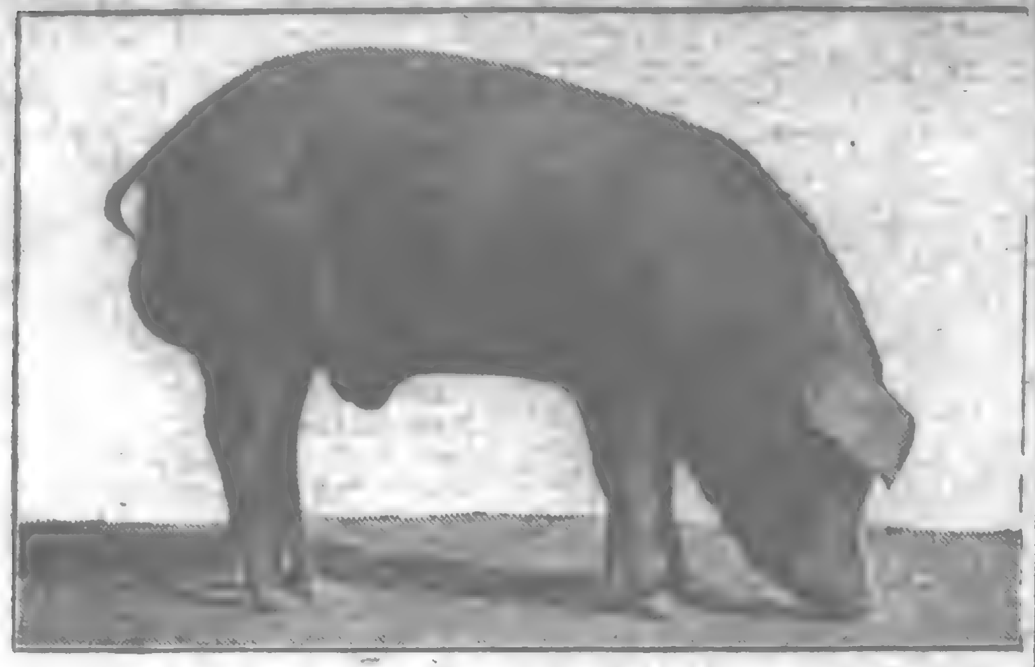
American Farm Bureau



One of the Myron Stratton Farm's Duroc Jersey Hogs.

The El Paso County, Colorado, Farm bureau staged a demonstration tour the last week in July, which included several hog-breeding farms, on which outstanding work is being done. An interesting feature of this tour was a visit to Myron Stratton farms, where a breeding-up experiment has been in progress with Duroc Jersey hogs for five generations. This is patterned after the famous Sni-a-Bar Shorthorn experiment, started in Jackson county, Missouri, by the late Col. William R. Nelson, founder of the Kansas City Star.

Many Purchased Hogs.

James Gauld, farm superintendent at Myron Stratton, is vice-president of the El Paso County Farm bureau. County Agent J. C. Hale worked with him in handling the tour. Visitors to the farm saw sires and dams of five successive generations of hogs, and this year's crop of pigs, for comparison. The demonstration was begun with mediocre grades and each generation was improved by better blood from the sire's side. There are now 250 purebred Durocs on the farm and the surplus stock is being disseminated throughout the region through the pig clubs.

Home for Aged and Infirm.

Myron Stratton home is an institution for the care of the aged and infirm endowed by a Colorado pioneer prospector and miner, who struck it rich during the Cripple Creek gold rush. A magnificent grain and live-stock farm surrounds the million dollar plant and it is on this farm that the better sires demonstration in hog breeding is showing such wonderful results.

TO CO-OPERATE WITH CHILDREN'S BUREAU

Women Will Assist in Carrying Out Program for Benefit of Mothers and Children.

The Home and Community committee of the American Farm Bureau federation has developed definite plans for co-operating with the federal children's bureau of the Department of Labor. The committee plans to devote much of its energy in assisting the department in carrying out its program of benefit for mothers and children in rural communities, according to Mrs. Charles Schuttler, chairman of the committee.

Mrs. Schuttler pointed out that through the farm bureau the work of the children's bureau could be made of practical value to the farm woman in the same manner as the farm bureau has brought home to the man on the farm the value of the Department of Agriculture.

Mrs. Charles Schuttler.

The children's bureau of the United States Department of Labor, summarizing the work done by it in rural districts since its establishment ten years ago, makes the following statement:

"The bureau's studies, in addition to those concerned with maternity and infant care and child hygiene, have covered juvenile courts, care of handicapped and dependent children, illegitimacy, mothers' pensions, and the work of children as related to school attendance; they apply both to city and to country and with respect of these subjects rural as well as urban localities have been surveyed.

The bureau has called attention to the fact that courts with special provision for dealing with delinquent children were available in [illegible] 15 per cent of the rural population. [illegible]

[illegible] tory laborers' children, for whose education and welfare no single community is responsible, and among whom illiteracy is particularly high. Serious retardation has been found also among working children of farm owners. Of interest in this connection is the American Farm Bureau federation's declaration, in the resolutions adopted at Chicago, November 14, 1919, that "with few exceptions in the past forty years the farmers' sole profit has come from unrestored fertility taken from the soil, and from long hours of work and unpaid labor of women and children * * * these are legitimate factors in the cost of food production, and must be so recognized by commercial interests and by the general public."

TEN YEARS OF FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Idea Spread Until Now There Is an Organization in Every County in State of Ohio.

The farm bureau in Ohio was ten years old last March. It was in Portage county that farmers first formed themselves into an organization for business, and hired a paid county agent to look after their interests. From this start the idea has spread until there is now a voluntary organization of farmers in a farm bureau organization in every county in Ohio with a paid county agent. During this period these county organizations have federated into a state organization, the Ohio Farm Bureau federation, which had a membership of over 100,000 farmers in Ohio the first of this year.

In Portage county the first organization was formed primarily to get better roads for the farmers. Later organizations, however, combined a number of ideas and projects which came primarily through the extension work of Ohio state university. This extension work started largely in agricultural education work through schools and boys' and girls' clubs.

It was soon found that this work could be done more efficiently through an organization in each county, and this was partly responsible for the formation of county farm bureaus and the employment of county agricultural agents.

It was during the fever of war activities that the farm organization idea spread the most rapidly. The largest number of counties were organized in the years [illegible] [illegible]

Hoosier News Briefly Told

Columbus. — Citizens of Flatrock township, Bartholomew county, are experimenting on a new form of keeping a highway in good condition, which, they say, is successful and which saves them a large amount of money. They are resurfacing a highway, and are doing it themselves instead of placing the work in the hands of a contractor. The first half mile of the road, which is northwest of Clifford and is three and a half miles long, has been completed. The work includes grading and graveling, such as is usually done by a contractor. It is estimated that it will cost less than $700 a mile, while the cost of such road when built in the usual way would be $2,500 a mile. Township machinery is used in the work.

Columbus.—Only six of the members of the Twenty-second Indiana volunteer infantry, Civil war veterans, were able to attend the reunion of their organization recently held in Columbus, but they held their meeting, elected officers and selected Scottsburg as the place for the next reunion, in August, 1923. P. W. Sample of Nabb, Clark county, was elected president; J. R. Wright, Indianapolis, secretary and treasurer, and Mrs. Mary Orrill of Columbus, assistant secretary. A resolution was adopted giving honorary membership to all wives, sons and daughters of the members of the regiment. It is believed that of the 2,200 men in the regiment during the war, only 200 are living.

Marion.—The use of tobacco by pupils or teachers in the schools of Grant county is prohibited by the rules and regulations set forth by the Grant county board of trustees. County schools must be in session from 8:40 a. m. until 4 p. m., with one hour for lunch and forenoon and afternoon recesses of not more than twenty minutes. The Bible has a prominent place in the new curriculum as follows: "A judicious use of the Bible and anything having a tendency to impress the minds of the pupils with truth of right living is recommended."

Greencastle.—One of the largest catfish ever brought here was caught recently in the Wabash river near Montezuma by William Thompson and Jesse Ford. It weighed 50 pounds. Two smaller ones, one weighing 20 pounds and another 12 pounds, were caught at the same place. The big one was landed on a trot line, baited with a small catfish that weighed 1½ pounds. It took the men 30 minutes to get it in the boat and it almost swamped the boat by beating around, after it was landed.

Indianapolis.—Game wardens of the state conservation department obtained 260 convictions out of 270 arrests for violations of game laws during July, and the total amount received from fines totaled $4,885, George N. Mannfield, chief of the fish and game division of the department announced. In July a year ago, a total of 126 convictions were obtained out of 132 arrests, and the fines collected amounted to $3,943.

Indianapolis.—Thomas S. McMurray, Jr., state insurance commissioner, has suspended until September 26 the order he issued July 10, reducing standard old line insurance rates on fireproof buildings and contents in Indiana. He said the suspension resulted from a question raised by the companies as to the scope of the order. The question will become the subject of a hearing September 26, he said.

Crothersville.—Damage estimated at $50,000 was caused by fire at the plant of the White-Wood Products company located here. The loss is said to be partly covered by insurance. The Crothersville water works system, which was completed recently, gave fire pressure for the first time, undoubtedly saving adjoining buildings, and prevented a much heavier loss.

North Vernon.—Sawdust, which is hauled by truck from Lovett, a distance of ten miles, is the fuel used at an ice plant in this city. The plant is the only source of ice supply in the county and it is kept in operation day and night. The trucks also are kept running both day and night hauling the [illegible]

Indianapolis.—The state teachers' retirement fund board will have a representative at each of the county public school teachers' institutes held in the state before September 1, to explain the new retirement law and to urge teachers to make application for membership before the time limit expires September 1, Estes Duncan, secretary of the board, announced. Special conferences on the retirement fund law will be held in the counties where teachers' institutes are scheduled to be held after September 1, it was said. These counties are: Crawford, Floyd, Franklin, Lawrence, Madison, Perry, Starke, Steuben, Sullivan, White, Whitley, Owen and Daviess.

Laporte.—The 600 Camp Roosevelters recently left Laporte for their homes in all parts of the country. A special train was made up to carry the boys to Chicago. The health at the camp was excellent, not one serious case of illness having occurred. Two hundred and twenty-seven boys made their credits in the summer school. The mess satisfied all and the discipline and training showed remarkable results. "The very best record we have ever had in our four years' experience, I am happy to say," said Major Beals, as he waved good-by to the departing boys.

Greenfield.—The board of Hancock county commissioners has served notice on the city council that the county will require three rooms on the first floor occupied by the offices of the mayor, clerk and treasurer, after December 1. The demand for extra rooms was made on petition of the Hancock County Farmers' association for the use of the county agricultural agent, and for a meeting place for farmers and farm women. These rooms have been occupied by the city for 20 years.

Indianapolis.—"Indiana needs a driver license law by which the individual license can be revoked in case of serious violations of motor vehicle laws," said H. C. Lathrop, president of the Indianapolis Automobile Trade association. "The directors of this association are giving serious consideration to the plan to present such a statute to the next legislature so that we can further back up the judges and police officials who are attempting to bring about strict law enforcement for the protection of life and property."

Indianapolis.—The board of directors of the Indiana Dairy Marketing association has reported that the association will start collective marketing of milk and dairy products in and about Muncie within a few weeks. It is understood that the association acts in the Indianapolis district as sales agent for the products of its members living in 15 counties tributary to the city. Extension of this plan is going forward now in the Muncie district.

Seymour.—The Jackson County Fair association has appointed a committee to inspect sites near Seymour and Brownstown which have been suggested for a permanent fair ground. Plans of the organization call for the construction of buildings for live stock displays and other exhibitions that must be protected from the weather, and also for a race track and grandstand. The association has decided to hold no fair at Seymour this year. It had been set for September 18 to 23.

South Bend.—Plans for the convention of the Indiana Real Estate association, to be held in South Bend September 13 and 14, are being perfected by committees. It was expected originally to provide accommodations for 500 visitors, but this estimate has been found to be entirely too low, as Indianapolis, Gary and Muncie alone will provide that number, according to information received.

PROPER METHOD OF FLY CONTROL IS TO PREVENT MULTIPLICATION

A Fly-Trap That Kills the Larvae—The Manure Is Stored on a Slatted Rack Above a Concrete Pit Containing Water—Larvae, Following Their Tendency to Burrow Downward, Pass Through Manure and Fall Into Water.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Fly-traps have a distinct place in the control of the house fly and other noxious fly species, although the limitations of fly-traps must be recognized and other methods of control also practiced. The bureau of entomology, United States Department of Agriculture, points out that the logical method of fly control is to prevent multiplication, by proper attention to breeding places.

The two main ways in which fly-traps are valuable are by catching flies that come to clean premises from insanitary places and by capturing flies that have escaped from other means of destruction. Nearly all fly-traps are made on the same general principle, although they may appear quite different. The flies are attracted by bait, odors, or light into a cage with a large entrance and an exit too small to be easily found, which is often made by using a cone-shaped passage.

Two Chief Classes of Flies.

There are two chief classes of flies that can be caught in traps—those that breed in animal matter or become a pest to live stock, and those that breed in vegetable as well as in animal matter. The former consist mainly of the so-called blow-flies, including the screw-worm fly; in the latter group the house fly is by far the most important. It is attracted to almost any moist material, especially that having an odor.

The general principle involved in nearly all fly-traps is modified to fit different conditions, as in the window trap, which catches the flies as they endeavor to enter or leave a building; The garbage can trap, and the manure box trap, which retains flies bred from infested manure already in the box. Light is an important factor in the success of all traps, for flies have a marked tendency to go toward the light.

While many commercial traps are on the market, anyone with a few tools can construct traps at a small fraction of the sale price of ready-made ones. The conical hoop trap, which appears from extensive tests to be most effective, durable, easily made, and repaired, can also be made quite cheaply. It consists of a screen cylinder with a barrel-hoop frame containing a screen cone inside. The total cost of the material, if bought new at [illegible] is about $1. If only wire [illegible] are bought the cost should not [illegible]

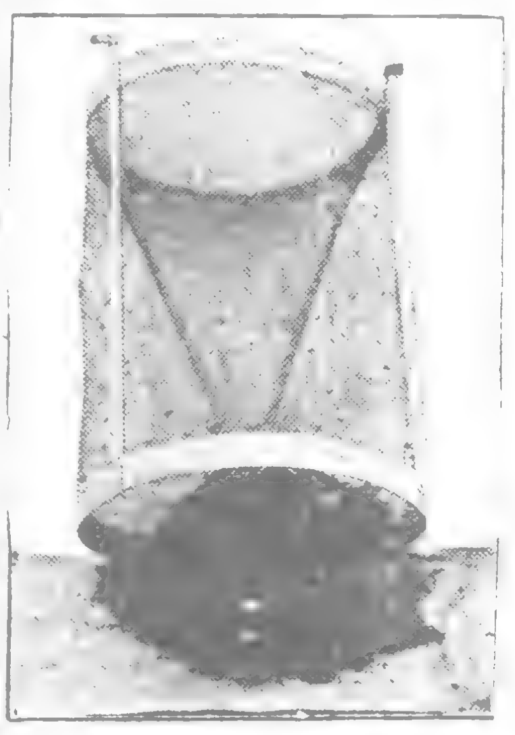
tion renders the material attractive. A mixture of cheap "black-strap" molasses and water is an economical and effective bait for the house-fly. One part molasses is mixed with three parts water. Sugar-beet or "stock molasses" is fairly attractive in regions where it is produced. Brown-sugar sirup allowed to ferment is good if mixed in the proportion of one part brown sugar in four parts of water. A small amount of vinegar added hastens fermentation. If honey bees are attracted by this bait some other kind should be used. Milk on dairy farms is the next choice to cane molasses as a cheap and convenient attractant. The curd from the milk combined with brown sugar and water is a very good bait. The best bait containers are broad and shallow rather than deep. Traps must be properly cared for and placed in suitable locations. The bait containers must be kept well filled and also frequently washed out. Traps should be emptied of dead flies at least once a week.



A Good Catch

Sticky fly papers and poisoned baits have their uses in fly control as well as traps, and it is advised that Farmers' Bulletin 851 be consulted for further information on house-fly control, and Farmers' Bulletin 857 for additional measures to be used against the screw-worm fly and other flies infesting wounds in stock and those that blow soiled wool in sheep.

TUBERCULOSIS FIGHT AIDED BY PUBLICITY

Inspired More Faith in Safety of Foods From Cows.

Statistics Show That Number of Animals Has Increased and Consumption of Milk Is Much Greater Than Ever Before.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

When extensive campaigns against tuberculosis of cattle were launched many persons interested in the dairy business predicted that giving publicity to such conditions would alarm the consumer and reduce the consumption of milk and dairy products. But instead of producing this result, says the United States Department of Agriculture, the increasing efforts to improve the health of herds have inspired more faith in the safety and value of foods from the dairy cow. Hundreds of towns have made tuberculosis regulations to provide for clean herds and to make milk wholesome and publicity has been given to the various kinds of work done by cities, counties, states, and the Department of Agriculture. As a result of this work to improve the health of the dairy cow, statistics show that the number of cows has increased and the consumption of milk is greater than ever before.

FLOCK TO CANADA

Immigrants of High Order Settling on Western Plains.

Removal of Restrictions Necessary During the War Has Shown World's Faith in Dominion's Future.

For a period during the late war, and for a while after its close, there was put into operation by the Canadian government legislation restricting certain classes and people of the countries which were not lined up with the allied nations from being admitted to Canada. This was quite necessary, and the reasons for it will be so apparent that they need not be given. However, the time came, in the early summer of this year, when it was deemed possible to remove some of these restrictions. It was found that there were many who came under their ruling that were of a class that Canada needed and who needed Canada. The restrictions, doubtless, were drastic, but were needful. The news of their removal, sent broadcast, has met with such a response as to give ample evidence that they had not killed interest in Canada, and that faith in the Dominion as a country where a new existence, happy and fruitful, was as complete as ever. As has been stated by one writer dealing with this subject, "the opening of the doors a little wider has but disclosed the dammed-up state of the stream, which, given freer release, is pouring in fuller force over the Dominion."

As to the moral effect of the legislation that enabled these restrictions to be carried out, it showed that while Canada was seeking settlers, its lands and its homes were not intended as a shelter for those unable to meet the standard set as Canada's laws of civilization, the concessions which have removed these restrictions still have in view the maintenance of this standard, and those who are still allowed in are subject to the same requirements that have prevailed for years. As pointed out by the writer previously quoted, "Canada has successfully impressed on those countries from which she draws her people that her prime and crying need is for those who will go on land, and of those entering the country the bulk is composed of agriculturists. Every country which has formerly contributed to Canada's population has resumed its mission to its shores.

"The lowering of the barriers has had a farther-reaching effect than the entry into the country of many formerly debarred by reasons of financial stringency. It has had a moral effect. The restriction was rightly regarded as an indication of Canada's internal economic condition, and many persons and families of comfortable means contemplating Canadian settlement were discouraged from doing so. In the removal is seen the first blush of the dawn of better days, and consequently many of those arriving are in a condition to establish rapidly and securely.

"Though Canadian immigration falls broadly into the two classes, British and American, many European peoples have contributed in a large measure to the agricultural development of the Western provinces, and it is gratifying to note the same healthy interest in Canada evinced by the most desirable of these.

"Amongst those from the European countries are Serbians, Poles, Swiss, Roumanians, Dutch, Jugo-Slavs, French, Danish, Norwegians, Swedes, Finns and Lithuanians. All have constituted fine, desirable citizen-building material, as the few detentions and lesser deportations bear testimony. Furthermore, the disturbed industrial conditions of the New England states have resulted in the commencement of an exodus of French-Canadian families back to their old homes, which may reach an appreciable size.

"On all sides this awakening of interest is evident. It is a new faith borne on the crest of the wave of brighter prospects, the dawn of a fuller realization, in the continued inability of many other countries to emerge from the economic slough into which the war plunged them, of the desirability of Canada as a country more rapidly throwing off its post-bellum depression, and its great place in the world's immediate future.

"British migration is of a healthy and desirable order, of sturdy composition, and frequently heavily capitalized. Many Scottish farmers have already arrived this year."

Every state in the Union is contributing its quota, and joining with those who have been in Canada for a number of years in the work of reclaiming the virgin prairie of the great plains of the West and converting them into immense fields of golden grain, or its grasses into fodder for the dairy cow or the fattening steer.—Advertisement.

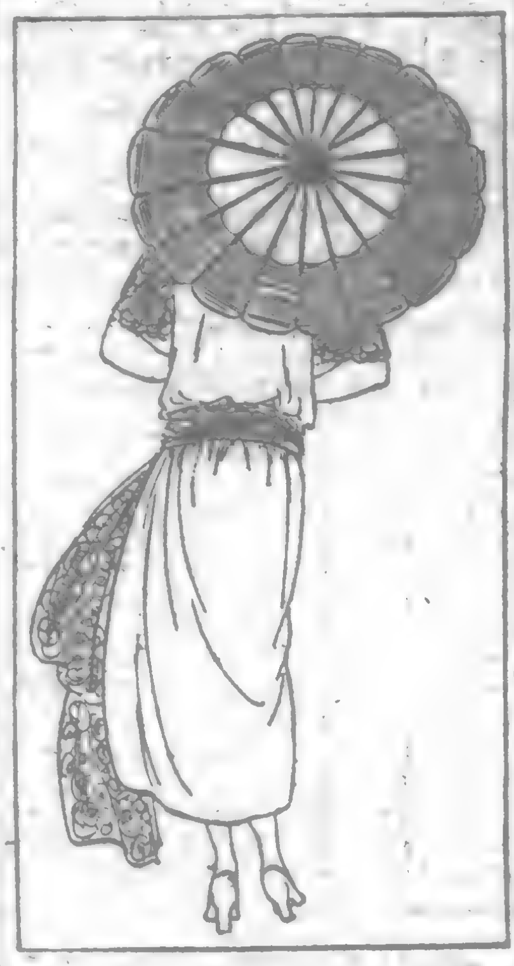
Beach Togs Are Gay But Simple

A trip to the seashore discloses more and more color, more and more charm, observes a fashion writer in the New York Times. In every dress accessory for a seaside day there is a freedom of individuality which marks this present season as, we might say, an individual season. Clothes stand out as they never before have done, and in the bright light of the summer sun their colors radiate this newly acquired temerity.

Not only on the beach, in bathing dress, is the girl of today unusually resplendent while at the seashore. In all of the gowns and frocks she chooses to wear during the other hours of the day and evening she continually shows her new taste for a touch of the bizarre, if not a great deal of flashing color, and her desire to have clothes of artistic merit. The result is that since she has adopted this newer ideal there appears every day some beautiful costume that in summer seasons gone by we would hardly have had the privilege of seeing. It is astonishing how really picturesque the summer girls are, added to the fact that they are as pretty as ever. Sometimes they used to be pretty without an assumption of being artistic.



Parasol of Two Tones of Silk Is Carried With an Afternoon Frock of Softly Draped Chiffon. The Sleeves and Sash Are of the Printed Chiffon.

One of the interesting points of the season's seaside dressing, and one that strikes you before you have time to draw your breath, is the general harmony achieved by each collection of materials and colors that makes a costume. The hat, in almost every instance, is just a working out of the scheme of the dress. Shoes and stockings are happily combined with other parts of the attire, and little things, such as bag, gloves, scarf, girdle, etc., seem to have been chosen with a care that makes them distinctive in themselves and notable as parts of a perfect whole.

Shore Dresses Are Different.

The shore dresses differ pointedly from those chosen for wear at other summer resorts, in that women are realizing the necessity of keeping their seaside clothes in the class of the "unmussable." Seldom does one see a bedraggled-looking woman. Somehow, miraculously, their clothes seem to live through all onsets of humidity and salt spray, with their original character kept intact and their designs held inviolable.

Bathing suits are really inspiring. This season they so fearlessly demonstrate what they are and their major purposes in life that they become more beautiful only because of their sincerity. The one-piece suits are selected unfailingly by the girls who wish to swim and enjoy the surf. They are suited to the purpose better than any others and are [illegible] charming as adornments for the [illegible] form. All of the girls who have [illegible] will tell you that they have never been so comfortable [illegible]

Besides these so-called [illegible] suits, there are to be seen [illegible] the beaches all sorts of the fancier varieties. There are lovely taffeta ones covered with frills and rufflings of their own material. And they do not stop at the conventional and accepted black, but dash about through all the range of colorings. A woman is permitted to wear any color that happens to please her fancy and suit her complexion.

The gingham bathing dresses are making quite a hit. [illegible] them will prove beyond the shadow of doubt. You will not find the American woman of today wearing anything which is unbecoming. That is her first consideration, and when you see as many of one sort of dress as you do of the patterned linens and cretonnes, then you know full well that she has found something that adds to her natural beauty.

At the seashore places there are parasols made of a mass of silk petals. There was one of white chiffon, embroidered in bunches of flowers done in different bright colors of wool. There was another in taffeta, with a series of little plaited frills covering its surface. Still another had a rim of ragged ostrich flues about its edge, and another one had this same sort of edging done with ends of narrow ribbons in three pastel shades. There was a black parasol with a white shirred chiffon lining. There was a white parasol made of thick taffeta, and it had a ruffled black chiffon lining. The makers do all sorts of things with their parasols, and in every instance the sunshade is a means of carrying out the design established by the lines, the coloring and the general appearance of the dress. In many cases you will find that the dress itself is plain and unadorned, but the parasol attempts to be, and succeeds in being, a trimming for the whole costume.

The flowing, draped and graceful dresses are the order of the day at the seaside resorts. The very newest of them have skirts that are long, extremely circular in their cut, with overskirts and drapings and uneven hems galore. For many of these new dresses chiffon and georgette crepe have been used, so that with all the extra fullness with which they are provided and with the ample lines and drapings, they become most beautiful to look upon. One of them was done in white. It had the low waistline which has been so popularly accepted, and then it had an overskirt that was circular in its cut though gathered and made very full. This was full and plain across the back and in the front it opened over another layer of an underskirt. The dress was bound with white chiffon and corded with white and there was no trimming anywhere about it—just full sleeves and a very full bodice. Worn with this was a black openwork hat, spreading of brim and picturesque of shape. It made the combination of black and white in the cleverest sort of manner, and, as a costume, succeeded in being about as charming as any created this summer.

Draped and Flowing Dresses.

There are draped and flowing silk crepe dresses and those made of printed crepes and chiffons. As a rule these are not trimmed but use their floating panels and their plaited flounces and made from the knitted materials which have been so perfected during this last season. They are colorful in the extreme, cut with the utmost simplicity, and have been so perfectly designed and fitted to all types of figures that they have created a vogue for this type of dress that it is hard to equal. The knitted outing dress has increased its popularity because it has been so well developed.

There are knitted skirts and knitted sweaters and knitted coats and knitted blouses. Everything is knitted when it comes to the matter of outing wear. And so, when you know your coloring and the colors [illegible]

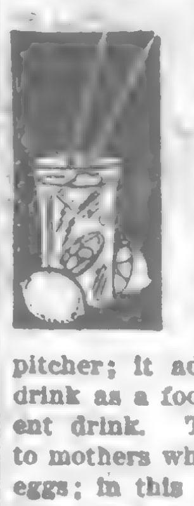
HOT WEATHER DRINKS



If we have been forehanded and last summer and fall provided for the hot days, by putting up various fruit juices, we will always be prepared for the warm weather.

Of course there is the ever-present lemon, which is a good old standby, and one of which we never tire. Add a beaten egg to a pitcher of lemonade—two, if a good-sized pitcher; it adds to the value of the drink as a food and makes it a different drink. This will be a good tip to mothers who want the family to eat eggs; in this way they go down with little protest. With the addition of a sprig of mint or a section of lemon the delicacy and attractiveness of the draught is increased.

The juices of any of the berries make delicious fruit drinks. Raspberry shrub is especially well liked. This is prepared by adding vinegar to the berries, let stand for a day and drain, sweeten the juice, cook and bottle. Grape juice is one of the most popular of all; this may be bought in any town, but when prepared at home is of much better quality and less expensive. Cocoa or chocolate for those who are fond of these flavors may be prepared in a sirup and kept for weeks.

Iced coffee and tea are both refreshing and stimulating.

Iced Tea.—Take two teaspoonfuls each of green and black tea; pour over a pint of boiling water and cover tightly, let stand five minutes to draw. Take a large piece of ice, place in a granite pan and pour over it the boiling tea. When well chilled add water to taste and fill glasses. Garnish with sections of lemon and serve with loaf sugar.

Fruit Shrub.—Cover the berries, using half as much vinegar as berries, let them stand for three days in a cool place, then strain and add four more quarts of fruit to the juice and vinegar; again stand three days, drain and put into a preserving kettle with a pound of sugar to each three cupfuls of juice. Boil and seal in bottles. Blackberries, loganberries, or any fruit may be thus treated.

Frozen Beef Tea.—This is a novelty which will appeal to the invalid during the hot weather. Take a thick cut of round steak, broil it quickly until the juice begins to run, place in a vegetable press and extract all the juice. Add a pinch of salt and serve frozen like mush.

Don't think you have a corner on the trouble market. I could mention several varieties you've never even heard of. What you need is the philosophy of cheerful endurance. Then you will begin to accomplish.—Lloyd.

TASTY TID-BITS

A delicacy to serve with a cup of tea is round, crisp crackers spread with cottage cheese and a maraschino cherry placed in the middle. Gingerbread cut in small rounds may be treated the same way. A small square of apple jelly may be used in place of the cherry, if desired.

Another cheese cracker which is not very common is prepared as follows: Take the fresh crisp crackers a third longer than wide and lay them side by side in a dripping pan. Cut thin oblongs of cheese slightly smaller than the crackers, lay on, and over this place halves of pecans, four or five to each cracker. Place in the oven and melt the cheese. Serve with crisp stalks of white celery.

Rice a la Creme.—Wash one-half cupful of rice and cook in water until partly done, then add milk and simmer until the milk is absorbed; season with a little salt. Dissolve one tablespoonful of gelatin in a little water, add to the hot rice, sugar to sweeten and vanilla to flavor. When cold add a half cupful of heavy cream whipped, pour into a mold and serve with fruit as a garnish.

Head Lettuce With Roquefort Dressing.—Arrange the heart leaves of lettuce on the salad plates. Sprinkle each with a spoonful of finely minced roquefort cheese, then add a highly seasoned mayonnaise and serve. The cheese may be stirred into the dressing, if desired.

ANIMAL PARK

"They think they're important, and they think correctly," said the Lion.

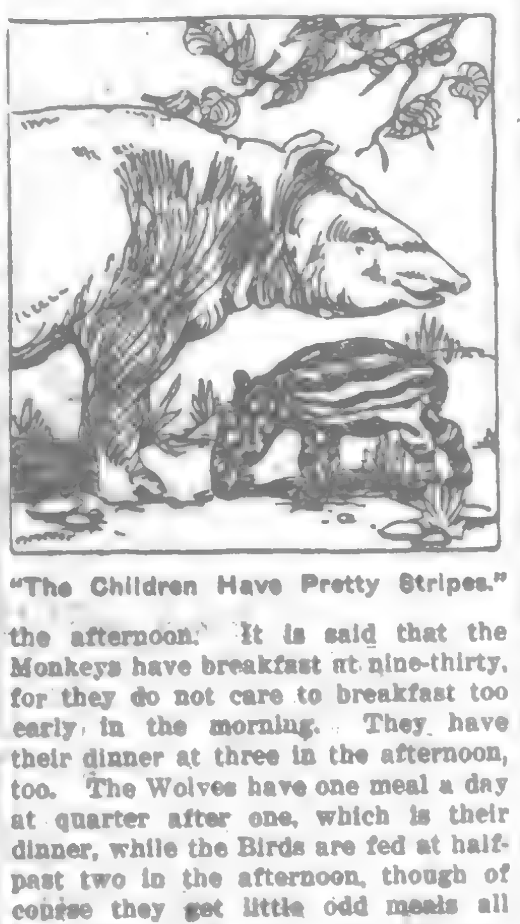
"Yes," said the Leopard, "that is right."

"What are you talking about now?" asked the Hyena.

"Well," said the Lion, "they have an announcement. An announcement is like a notice, you know. And this one is about us. They're letting the people know when we're fed so they can come and see us. They're telling the visitors that the Lions and the Tigers and the Leopards, and the Hyenas, the Chimpanzees and some of the rest of us are all fed in our house, the Lion House, named in honor of us, at half-past one each day. That is our breakfast, dinner and supper combined—which means that it is our breakfast, dinner and supper all in one.

"They also say that the Tigers and ourselves are not fed on Sunday, for it is good for our health not to be fed each day, or rather to have one day in the week when we give—or the keepers give—our tummies a rest. The other animals are fed here at the same time on Sundays.

"Then they say that the Bears and the Sea-Lions have breakfast at eight in the morning and dinner at three in the afternoon. It is said that the Monkeys have breakfast at nine-thirty, for they do not care to breakfast too early in the morning. They have their dinner at three in the afternoon, too. The Wolves have one meal a day at quarter after one, which is their dinner, while the Birds are fed at half-past two in the afternoon, though of course they get little odd meals all the time. It is true," the Lion continued, "that most of us get those, too, and the Birds always have water to drink, and so it is.



"The Children Have Pretty Stripes."

"But still people do not speak of their little odd meals but only of their main meals, and so I have done the same, and these main meals are the ones they've invited the visitors to come and see us eat. Well, I think it is pretty fine. It shows that we're of great importance."

"No one goes to see people eat. They couldn't gather a crowd about them. It is the animals that the people come to see.

"Yes, it is our meal time they come to see. Ah, how interesting that is to think that the people come to see us eat, and yet they couldn't get us to go and see them eat even if we were free.

"And they couldn't even get each other to view such a performance, I'm sure."

So the Lion talked.

In another part of the Animal Park Mrs. Hippopotamus was talking to her young son.

"You were a fine swimmer from the moment you were born, and you're going to be generous with your portions as we all are. By that I mean that you, too, will have a great huge mouth and great, enormous feet, and a mighty body. There won't be anything small and mean about you. You'll be generous in your size. And that is the proper spirit, the proper spirit, indeed."

In yet another part of the Animal Park the African Elephant was talking to the Indian Elephant.

"It's mostly a matter of ears," the African Elephant said. "My ears are much larger than yours and I am larger, too, but you're more usual. By that I mean to say that there seem to be more of you about in parks and circuses."

"I'm glad of it," said the Indian Elephant, "for I am quite sociable by nature."

The Tapirs, too, were talking. They are strange looking, but perhaps they [illegible]

WORN OUT AFTER SHE COOKED A MEAL

Took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound—Read the Result

Cincinnati, Ohio.—"I suffered for a year with nervous troubles and irregularities before I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. My back pained all the time and I was unfit for housework. I was worn out if I cooked a meal, and was unable to do my washing. My girl friends and my sister told me if I would take your Vegetable Compound and Liver Pills I would be relieved. After taking the first bottle I felt better, and neglected it awhile, but found I could not do my work until I was stronger. So I took the Vegetable Compound again and now I am the mother of a 19 months old boy. He is fat and healthy and I am sure I could never have carried him if it had not been for your Vegetable Compound. I recommend your medicine to all women although I am young to be advising some one older."—Mrs. CHRIST. PETROFF, 318 W. Liberty St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound contains no harmful drugs and can be taken in safety by any woman.

Up-to-Date Youngster.

Whether the generations advance or not may be undecided, but they certainly change. Recently a Portland mother explained to her early-teen son that certain guns and baseball equipment and radio addenda could not be bought, as the family exchequer was limited and "Daddy has to work hard to get the money we live on and we have to make it go a long way." In "daddy's" Sunday school books, of course, the boy would have said: "Then, my dear mamma, cannot my next suit be made from papa's old seatless troussers?" or "Next Christmas, my dear mamma, I shall do without lollipops." But this Western-American, Twenty-first-century lambkin replied:

"Well, why can't pop get more money?"—Portland Oregonian.

Had Missed Something.

We had been living in the suburbs for five years, and had just moved back to the same house that we had lived in before. Our little girl, who is six years old, was saying "that she was borned in this house."

Her little brother said he was, too.

Sister said, "No, you were in heaven then."

"If I was," John retorted, "I don't remember of seeing Jesus."—Chicago Journal.

BENNINGHOFF

Lillie Benninghoff, daughter of George Shutt and Mary Ann Shutt, was born April 23rd, 1860, about two and one-half miles east of Spencerville, Indiana, and departed this life on July 31st, 1922, at the age of 62 years, three months and eight days. She grew up to young womanhood and later on married, at a young age, George Benninghoff, who then resided only approximately one mile from her home. The first year they resided with his parents in Allen County, but soon thereafter came to make their home on now the Benninghoff farm, one mile north, and she continued to reside at that place until the time of her death. She then resided on that farm for a period of 45 years, or since 1877.

To this marriage were born seven children, William Benninghoff, Bertha, now deceased, who died at the age of 6 years, Harriett Ditmer of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Mildred Enzor, Howard Benninghoff of Fort Wayne, Indiana, Ruth, now deceased, dying in mere infancy. That upon her death she had five grandchildren: Joy Dittmer, Thelma Benninghoff Keener, Wayne Benninghoff, Mary Benninghoff and Marjorie Benninghoff, and one great grandchild, Gladys Keener.

The deceased had three sisters and two brothers, namely Ella Harter of Scipio Township, Allen County; Hattie Beams of Spencerville, Indiana, Samuel Shutt, deceased, who died at the age of sixteen, also Gertrude Carey of Ft. Wayne, Indiana, and Mortimer Shutt of Spencerville, Indiana.

We must not overlook her bountiful care and attention that she bestowed upon Paul Miller, when she took him at the age of nine years and raised him until he was ready and capable of meeting the battles of the world.

A word might be said of her ancestry. Her ancestors first emigrated to this country on or about 1775 and settled along the eastern shores of the Atlantic there later on to pick up their belongings and make their way to the golden west. Her father was one of a family of nine children and before the eldest one had reached the age of fourteen years the mother was left alone in the world to properly nurse them to manhood and womanhood, and later her father married Mary Ann Houk and went to reside on the old Shutt farm, east of Spencerville, in 1853.

At the time her father purchased this farm in 1853 it was necessary for him to give a mortgage in the amount of $300 for a period of three years, to be payable $100 per year. This was paid off before the maturity of the mortgage, and from that date until about 1919, the date on which the farm was sold by the heirs including the deceased, no other mortgage or incumbrance was ever placed upon the premises.

This goes to show the sturdy and industrious character of her ancestry. Even though they were born into poverty yet upon their death the necessary means of support was always left for their widow and their children.

The deceased, as well as her father and mother, was always a conscientious and industrious Christian and always was doing some handiwork for the Lord.

That her husband, George Benninghoff, departed this life on May 6th, 1916.

Although our departed loved one lived only a little over three score years, yet in this seemingly short span of years [illegible] many things worth mentioning into her [illegible]

GRAMONT AND LUCIE

SYNOPSIS.—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season Jachin Fell, wealthy though somewhat mysterious citizen, and Dr. Ansley, are discussing a series of robberies by an individual known as the Midnight Masquer, who, invariably attired as an aviator, has long defied the police. Joseph Maillard, wealthy banker, is giving a ball that night, at which the Masquer has threatened to appear and rob the guests. Fell and Ansley, on their way to the affair, meet a girl dressed as Columbine, seemingly known to Fell, but masked, who accompanies them to the ball. Lucie Ledanois, recently the ward of her uncle, Joseph Maillard, is the Columbine. At the ball, Bob Maillard, son of the banker, again proposes to her and is refused. He offers to buy some of her property. A Franciscan monk interests her. He turns out to be Prince Gramont. In his library Joseph Maillard and a group of his friends are held up and robbed by the Midnight Masquer. Lucie Ledanois, the last of an old family, is in straitened circumstances. Joseph Maillard's handling of her funds has been unfortunate. Fell is an old friend of her parents and deeply interested in the girl. Henry Gramont, really the Prince de Gramont, is enamored of Lucie. Lucie talks with Fell about her affairs and the Masked Masquer.

"Some of them, yes—and all that prince stuff with them." Smiling as he dropped into English, Gramont glanced about the room, and his eyes softened.

"This is a lovely and lovable home of yours, Lucie!" he exclaimed, gravely. "So few homes are worthy the name; so few have in them the intimate air of use and friendliness—why are so many furnished from bargain sales? This place is touched with repose and sweetness; to come and sit here is a privilege. It is like being in another world, after all the money striving and the dollar madness of the city."

"Oh!" The girl's gaze searched him curiously. "I hope you're not going to take the fine artistic pose that it is a crime to make money?"

Gramont laughed.

"Not much! I want to make money myself; that's one reason I'm in New Orleans. Still, you cannot deny that there is a craze about the eternal clutching after dollars. I can't make the dollar sign the big thing in life, Lucie. You couldn't, either."

She frowned a little.

"You seem to have the European notion that all Americans are dollar chasers!"

He shrugged his shoulders slightly. "In a sense, yes; why not?" he answered. "I am an American. I am a dollar chaser, and not ashamed of it. I am going into business here. Once it is a success, I shall go on; I shall see America, I shall come to know this whole country of mine, all of it! I have been a month in New Orleans—do you know, a strange thing happened to me only a few days after I arrived here!"

With her eyes she urged him on, and he continued gravely:

"In France I met a man, an American sergeant named Hammond. It was just at the close of things. We had adjoining cots at Nice—"

"Ah!" she exclaimed, quickly. "I remember, you wrote about him—the man who had been wounded in both legs! Did he get well? You never said."

"I never knew until I came here," answered Gramont. "One night, not long after I had got established in my pension on Burgundy street, a man tried to rob me. It was this same man, Hammond; we recognized each other almost at once.

"I took him home with me and learned his story. He had come back to America only to find his wife dead from influenza, his home broken up, his future destroyed. He drifted to New Orleans, careless of what happened to him. He flung himself desperately into a career of burglary and [illegible]. Well, I gave Hammond a [illegible] is my chauffeur. finis to their work except the dollar dropping into their pouch. Such a man is your relative, Joseph Maillard. I do not wish to offend you, and I shall therefore refrain from saying all that is in my mind. But you have not hesitated to intimate very frankly that you are not wealthy. Some time ago, if you recall, you wrote me how you had just missed wealth through having sold some land. I have taken the liberty of looking up that deal to some extent, and I have suspected that your uncle had some interest in putting the sale through——"

The gray eyes of the girl flashed suddenly.

"Henry Gramont! Are my family affairs to be an open book to the world? Do you realize that you are intruding most unwarrantably into my private matters?"

"Unwarrantably?" Gramont's eyes held her gaze steadily. "Do you really mean to use that word?"

"I do, most certainly!" answered Lucie with spirit. "I don't think you realize just what the whole thing tends toward——"

"Oh, yes I do! Quite clearly." Gramont's cool, level tone conquered her indignation. "I see that you are orphaned, and that your uncle was your guardian, and executed questionable deals which lost money for you. Come, that's brutally frank—but it's true! I came here to New Orleans and became involved in some dealings with your cousin, Bob Maillard. I believed, and I believe now, that in your heart you have some suspicion of your uncle in regard to those transactions in land. Therefore, I took the trouble to look into the thing to a slight extent. Shall I tell you what I have discovered?"

Lucie Ledanois gazed at him, her lips compressed. She liked this new manner of his, this firm and resolute gravity, this harshness. It brought out his underlying character very well.

"If you please, Henry," she murmured very meekly.

"Well, then, I have discovered that your uncle appears to be honestly at fault in the matter——"

"Thanks for this approval of my family," she murmured.

"And," continued Gramont, imperturbably, "that your suspicions of him were groundless. But, on the other hand, something new has turned up about which I wish to speak—[illegible] about which I must [illegible]. Has Bob Maillard offered to buy your remaining land on the Bayou Terrebonne?"

She started slightly. So it was to this that he had been leading up [illegible]

"Did you bring that chauffeur?"

"Yes," and he laughed at her eagerness.

"Good! I accept—because I must see that famous soldier-bandit-chauffeur. If you'll wait, I'll be ready in a minute."

She hurried from the room, a snatch of song on her lips. Gramont smiled as he waited.

CHAPTER V

The Masquer Unmasks.

In New Orleans one may find pensions in the old quarter—the quarter which is still instinct with the pulse of old-world life. These pensions do not advertise. The average tourist knows nothing of them. Even if he knew, indeed, he might have some difficulty in obtaining accommodations, for it is not nearly enough to have the money; one must also have the introductions, come well recommended, and be under the tongue of good repute.

Gramont had obtained a small apartment en pension—a quiet and severely retired house in Burgundy street, maintained by a very proud old lady whose ancestors had come out of Canada with the Sieur d'Iberville. Here Gramont lived with Hammond, quite on a basis of equality, and they were very comfortable.

The two men sat smoking their pipes before the fireplace, in which blazed a small fire—more for good cheer than through necessity. It was Sunday evening.

Gramont stared into the flickering fire and sucked at his pipe. Suddenly he roused himself and shot a glance at Hammond.

"Sergeant! You seem to have a pretty good recollection of that night at the Lavergne house, when I found you entering and jumped on you."

"You bet I have!" Hammond chuckled. "When you'd knocked the goggles off me and we recognized each other—h—l! I felt like a boob."

Gramont smiled. "How many places had you robbed up to then? Three, wasn't it?"

"Three is right cap'n," was the unashamed response.

"We haven't referred to it very often, but now things have happened." Gramont's face took on harsh lines of determination. "Do you know, it was a lucky thing that you had no chance to dispose of the jewels and money you obtained?"

"No chance?" snorted the other. "No chance is right, cap'n! And I was sore, too. Say, they got a ring of crooks around this town you couldn't bust into with grenades! Listen here, and I'll tell you something big."

Hammond leaned forward, lowered his voice, and tamped at his pipe.

"When I was a young fellow I lived in a little town up north—I ain't sayin' where. My old man had a livery stable there, see? Well, one night a guy come along and got the old man out of bed, and slips him fifteen hundred for a rig and a team, see? I drove the guy ten miles through the hills, and set him on a road he wanted to find.

"Now, that guy was the biggest crook in the country in them days—still is, I guess. He was on the dead run that night, to keep out o' Leavenworth. He kep' out, all right, and he's settin' in the game to this minute. Nobody never pinched him yet, and never will."

"Why?"

"Because his gang runs back to politicians and rich guys all over the country. You ask anybody on the inside if they ever heard of Memphis Izzy Gumberts! Well, cap'n, I seen that very identical guy on the street the other day—I never could forget his ugly mug! And where he is, no outside crooks can get in, you believe me!"

"Hm! Memphis Izzy Gumberts, eh? What kind of a crook is he, sergeant?"

"The big kind. You remember them Chicago lotteries? But you don't, o' course. Well, that's his game—lotteries and such like."

Gramont's lips clenched for a minute, then he spoke with slow distinctness:

"Sergeant, I'd have given five hundred dollars for that information a week ago!"

"Why?" Gramont shook his head. "Never mind. Forget it! Now, this stunt of yours was clever. You showed brains when you set yourself up as an aviator and pulled that stuff, sergeant. But you handled it brutally—terribly brutally."

"It was a little raw, I guess," conceded Hammond. "I [illegible] against it [illegible] over the [illegible] with [illegible] a pipe for [illegible]

FINANCING FUTURE HIGHWAYS

Make Plans Now and Place Transportation on Firm Foundation, Says Chief McDonald.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

"Plan now the financing of highways for the future and place highway transportation, which has come to be an indispensable part of our national life, on a firm foundation." This is the advice given by Thomas H. MacDonald, chief of the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, for the consideration of every voter, taxpayer and legislator.

"We are starting out to construct a system of highways such as no nation ever constructed before. The nearest approach to it is found in France and Germany, and the area of neither is as large as Texas. This great undertaking is being entered into because highways are not a luxury but furnish a real service, have a real earning capacity, and have become a national necessity.

For such an undertaking to be successful, financing to care for maintenance, reconstruction, and new construction should be planned for a long period of years in advance. Changes in methods of raising funds every few years, uncertainty as to whether funds will be provided, and periods in which funds are not provided all increase the final cost of highways. Such a policy would soon bring any private business to disaster.

"Development and increase in numbers of motor vehicles and the coincident need and demand for good roads have come so rapidly that methods of raising funds have often been expedients for the time being. Consideration has been given not so much to the just distribution of the cost as to how the funds can be raised with the least controversy and the utmost ease.

"All this leads to the conclusion that the whole situation should be gone over very carefully, traffic studies made, and the cost distributed in proportion to the service rendered.

"The bureau of public roads estimates that of the $600,000,000 spent for highways last year 33 per cent was federal aid and motor-vehicle revenue. The remaining 67 per cent comes either directly or will eventually be paid from state and local taxes. It is believed that a very considerable readjustment of the source of revenues must be made so that a larger percentage will be paid by the road user and a lesser percentage from state or local taxes."

NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER

LESSON TEXT—Neh. 1:1-11.

GOLDEN TEXT—The effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.—Jas. 5:16.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Ex. 32:20-32; I Sam. 7:5-11; Matt. 9:37, 38; Acts 1:12-14; Eph. 3:14-21.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Nehemiah Talking to God.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Prayer of the King's Cupbearer.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Prayer as a Preparation for All Undertakings.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Prayer and Power.

I. Nehemiah Learns of the Distress of the Captives (vv. 1-3).

1. When (v. 1). Twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes (2:1).

The month Chisleu corresponds to our December. It was while performing his duty as cupbearer to the Persian king. While in this important position there entered into his heart a desire to honor God and do good to his people. A young man can be true to God in any position in life if he sets his heart on Jesus Christ and communes with Him by prayer and study of God's word. A man may be elevated to a high position, prosper in business, and yet live a life unspotted from the world.

2. By Whom (v. 2). His brother Hanani and certain men of Judah brought him the news. His inquiry shows that though he was prosperous he did not forget his unfortunate brethren. We should never let our success and well-being shut out sympathy for the oppressed and suffering.

3. The Nature of the Distress (v. 3). The wall of Jerusalem was broken down. Its gates were burned with fire and the remnant of the captives were in great affliction and reproach.

II. Nehemiah's Sorrow (v. 4).

The news of his brethren's distress greatly moved Nehemiah. He sat down and wept and mourned several days. He fasted and prayed before God. God's people are so essentially one that the affliction and shame of the one is the affliction and shame of all. No one will ever do much to help a distressed people who does not deeply feel their desolation. Nehemiah's sorrow was not the kind that says "I pity you" and goes on in ways of selfishness without making an effort to help. True pity expresses itself in an effort to help.

III. Nehemiah's Prayer (vv. 5-11).

He knew where to go for help. He took the matter upon his heart to God in prayer. The first and best way to help others is to pray for them. Nehemiah did not merely pray; he left his place at the Persian court and journeyed to Jerusalem and took hold with his own hands. Our prayers and tears must be translated into definite action if we would be of real help to others. Note the characteristics of this prayer.

1. Its Worshipful Spirit (v. 5). He recognized God as the great and terrible One, the Lord God of heaven. True prayer shows that spirit of worship.

2. Its Ground (v. 5). It was on the ground of covenant relation that He besought God. On this ground all who are in Christ Jesus can come and plead before God.

3. It Was Persistent (v. 6). He prayed day and night. God is pleased when His servants are persistent in their pleadings with Him. Those who understand the covenant relation will be importunate in their petitions.

4. It Was Accompanied by Confession of Sin (vv. 6, 7). In this confession he mentioned definitely his sin (v. 7). We should specify the sins which we have committed. Most people when praying are too general in their confessions.

5. He Pleads God's Promises (vv. 8, 9). In our praying we should remind God of His own words. It is when His words abide in us that we can intelligently pray (John 15:7). If we would be successful in our praying we should fill our minds with God's promises.

6. He Pleads Relationship (v. 10). He reminds God that they were His children by redemption. Those who are in Christ are God's children by redemption through His precious blood. [illegible]

7. It was Intercessory Prayer (v. 11). [illegible]

Looking In on Congress From the House Gallery

THE STORY OF A BILL

By CONGRESSMAN GUY U. HARDY

Copyright, 1922, Western Newspaper Union.

About the easiest thing in the world for a member of congress to do is to introduce a bill.

All one needs to do is to write the bill out on a piece of paper and put it in the basket on the clerk's desk. Then it has been introduced.

Many bills are introduced, but few are passed. In the last congress 16,170 bills and 559 joint and concurrent resolutions were introduced in the house and 5,052 bills and 304 joint and concurrent resolutions in the senate.

Out of all of these, 69 public resolutions and 521 bills passed and became laws of the land. The record for the greatest number of bills introduced was made in the Sixty-first congress, when 34,388 bills and resolutions were introduced in the house alone, out of which 810 became law.

When the clerk gets hold of the bill he refers it to the appropriate committee. And there it may rest in peaceful slumber forever more, or it may be heard from again if enough pressure is exterted in its favor.

Out home a good friend of mine suggested once that he didn't like this committee system; he thought that each member should give individual consideration to every bill introduced. Imagine it, if you can.

No man can read fast enough to keep up with all bills introduced.

Most committees get more bills referred to them than can be given intelligent consideration. So, naturally, the bills which have the greatest support in the country get first consideration. Congress gives first consideration to the appropriation and revenue bills. These and some other bills of nation-wide importance come along automatically.

Hearings on Bills.

When a committee decides to give consideration to a bill, if it concerns many people or interests, hearings are held. That is, people interested are invited to come in and tell the committee why they think the bill should or should not become a law.

Sometimes these hearings are quite elaborate affairs. Some last several weeks and hundreds of people come from all over the country to testify for or against the bill. The tariff bill hearing brought experts and prominent representatives of every line of industry to Washington.

The appropriations committee has 35 members, the ways and means 25 members and other important committees have 21 members each. The members sit around a long table and the witness addresses them. The witness must know what he is talking about if he would make a good impression. Any member may interrupt him at any time with any question, and before he gets through the committee is likely to find out all he knows and some he doesn't know about his subject. The hearings are open to the public.

An official reporter takes down everything that is said, and later the hearings are printed in paper-bound book form. Some of these hearings, like that on the tariff, for instance, run into thousands of pages. They bring out a vast amount of useful information, and some of the printed hearings are practically textbooks on the subject discussed. The printed hearings are given to all members, so that they may become posted on any proposed legislation. Others who are interested may, at times, get copies.

After the hearings are closed the committee holds executive sessions and discusses the bill. It may decide not to report it out. This practically kills a bill. It may decide on some or many amendments to the bill, or it may rewrite the bill in another form, or it may report it out as it was introduced.

When the bill is reported out it goes on the calendar. There are several kinds of calendars, operating for different classes of bills under different rules.

Debating the Measure.

The big bills come up in the committee of the whole house on the state of the Union. Debate is usually two or four hours, though any amount of time may be agreed upon. Sometimes 12 or 14 hours has been agreed on. The time is equally divided between the majority and minority sides. The [illegible] usually some are adopted. On one bill over 300 amendments were offered. Often amendments are offered in order to weaken the bill and help to defeat it. Amendments not supported by the committee have hard sledding and few are passed. Occasionally amendments are offered by members merely to enable them to make a speech that may please constituents interested. It has been estimated that only about five per cent of the amendments offered on the floor are adopted.

When the bill is read through for amendments, which is the second reading, the committee of the whole votes on recommending its passage. If this is favorable the committee then "rises" and the speaker takes the chair and calls the house to order.

The chairman of the committee of the whole reports the proceedings to the speaker. Then the bill comes up for third reading. It is read by title only and voted on without further remarks or debate.

Fixed Up in Conference.

If it is passed, the bill is sent to the senate and has the same rocky road to travel over there. Probably it will have sundry amendments tacked to it in the senate. Then it comes back to the house for another vote. If the house declines to accept the amendments put in by the senate, the bill is sent to conference. That is, a committee made up of a few senators and representatives, the ranking members on the committees that reported the bill out, consider all phases, endeavor to compromise differences, and when they agree, their report goes back to both houses and is usually adopted. Once in a while the bill is sent back to conference several times before one of the houses is satisfied.

Many a proud father of proposed legislation does not recognize his fond offspring when it is finally passed by both houses and is ready to be sent over for the President's signature.

There are several other ways of getting bills up in the house. Those pertaining to claims, and pensions, and of a private nature, come up under "unanimous consent." On consent day the father of the bill has good reason to be on the anxious seat, for a single member may "object" and prevent the consideration of the bill. Very seldom does a member object out of spite or on account of personal enmity. But there are a half dozen who make a specialty of studying these bills and stand ready to see that they are properly amended or objected to. And many an innocent looking little bill is choked to death on unanimous consent day.

Some bills come up under a special rule. The rules committee presents a resolution providing a special rule for consideration of a bill. The bonus bill, for instance, came up under a special rule. Four hours were allowed for debate and then the bill came up for vote without allowing any amendments to be offered. You had to take the bill the way it was or not at all. The object, of course, was to prevent unreasonable and harmful amendments being offered or adopted. Men often vote for an amendment and then vote against the bill.

Some think that a curb should perhaps be put on the introduction of so many bills, but that is hardly possible. Who would be competent to censor? Of course the greatest freedom in this respect must prevail. Let the congress and the country decide which are worthy and needful. As a matter of fact when you come to think about it, the wonder is that many more bills are not introduced, for practically every man and at most every woman in the country has in his or her system the idea of some new law or laws that in his or her opinion ought to be enacted. Many of these ideas of proposed new legislation find their way in the shape of bills to the basket on the clerk's desk in the house of representatives or in the senate. Many start there, but very few wind up at the White House seeking the President's signature.

FORESEES VOYAGE TO MOON

Frenchman Predicts That in Near Future the Trip Can Be Made in Forty-Nine Hours.

M. Esnault-Pelterie of the Paris Aero club predicts that the utilization of the intra-atomic energy will enable men in the near future to travel from the earth to the moon in 49 hours. The first 31 minutes, it seems, will be very agreeable, but during the 48 hours and 29 minutes of the second part of the course one will have the sensation of a terrible fall in the void.

And this reminds one of the charming story told by Mark Twain:

One morning when standing at the window he perceived a human body falling through the air.

"How do you do?" asked Mark Twain gracefully.

"So far," the other replied, "I'm all right. But when I reach the ground floor it will be all wrong!"

MANNERS IN SECOND PLACE

Mrs. Clarver Put Necessity for Eating Far Above the Importance of Table Nicoties.

When Miss Violet Robinson, a colored teacher in Mobile, was invited by Mrs. Clarver, the mother of two of her pupils, to stay and have dinner with the family, she accepted with no anticipation of what was before her. Mr. Clarver hung far over his plate, and seemed engaged in a race against time and labor as he lifted knifeloads of viands to his mouth. His wife and children were not much outdone.

The teacher was not one to keep her thoughts from her face, and Mrs. Clarver looked at her first with distress and then with growing wrath as she felt the need of coming to her man's defense.

Finally she leaned across the table toward her guest, and pounded heavily with the handle of a fork.

"I'm tellin' yo' what it is," she said, emphatically. "Manners ain't nothin'. Eating must be!"—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Schools to Open Monday

The St. Joe and Concord Township schools will open next Monday morning at 8:30 o'clock. The classes will be temporarily organised at that time and the pupils will receive instructions about books and supplies.

The 3rd and 4th grades which occupied the room in the Leighty Block last term will occupy the room in the school building formely used by the 7th and 8th grades and the latter grades will move upstairs into the large recitation room where desks have recently been placed. The high school will be rather handicapped through the loss of this large room, but it will probably arrange to use other and smaller rooms for class rooms, with but little inconvenience.

The members of the teaching staff have been carefully selected by Trustee Bowman in an effort to assure us a most successful year. The names of the teachers and their positions are as follows:

Roy E. Maxwell, principal.
George Grosjean, assistant pr.
Mabel Schmalsried, English.
Lenore Moore, Art, Music, and Science.
Clyde Hart, 7th and 8th grades.
Lois Murphy, 5th and 6th "
Lea Nugen, 3rd and 4th grades.
Helen DeLong, 1st and 2nd "
Marjorie Curie, Hays school.

The drivers of the five school hacks to be used to convey the country pupils to St. Joe received their appointment last Thursday and are as follows:

Concord, A. Haner.
Saylors, Fred Saylor.
Yeiser, Monte Storer.
Orangeville, Jay Bleeks.
Cheesetown, Ella Wilmot.

With the burning of the Widney Opera House the school will be at a loss for a room in which to hold its basket ball games, its chief athletic activity. Nevertheless S. J. H. S. will make an effort to maintain its high standing in the district association this year. A room may be obtained here suitable for practice but most of the games will probably be held away from home.

Union Services Closes

The series of Sunday evening union services closed with a very interesting sermon last Sunday night, delivered by Rev. C. H. Havens of Cuba, Illinois. The crowd was not quite as large as usual, due to the fact that many of the Desciple folks were away attending the yearly meeting of their church, at Cedar Lake.

These meetings have been a success in every way. The local pastors took turns in preaching and whenever possible other available speakers were called upon to give the address, some of whom were of exceptional ability.

The people are very grateful to the Christian church for their hospitality and for the use of their lawn, organ, song books, etc. The grove proved to be an ideal place for the evening meetings.

Will Spend Less On Highways

Only two-thirds as much county road work will be done in DeKalb county in 1923 as in 1922, if the proposed expenditures is an indication. The county commissioners are asking the county council for only $50,000 for the coming year, while the appropriation made for the present year was $75,000.

The cost of operating the county poor farm will be cut even more. The amount being asked for that purpose is $6,500, and the amount appropriated for 1922 was $15,500. An item conspicuously absent from the appropriation ordinance this year will be the expense of elections. The amount for this purpose was $13,000 last year.

The appropriation ordinance to be presented to the county council at its annual meeting in the court house Tuesday, September 5, also shows a contemplated cut of $2,000 for the expense of maintaining the court house, the item of supplies being $4,000 as compared with $6,000 provided for this year. The requested appropriation for the Irene Byron tuberculosis hospital is cut from $12,000 to $10,000. The allowance for the expense of highways, viewers, damages, etc., was $1,500 last year, but only $1250 is asked this year. Expense of ditches is reduced from $5,000 to $3,000 and the bridge repair item is cut from $5,000 to $2,500.

The amount appropriated last year for the expense of the board of children's guardians was $2,000, but $3,000 is being asked this year.

Last year the county council refused to make appropriations for deputy hire for the county auditor, treasurer and clerk, but these items for the auditor and clerk have again been placed in the ordinance this year for the council's consideration.

Last year the county tax levy was raised from 32 to 45 cents on the $100. The increase was largely accounted for by the increase in the road fund from $25,000 to $75,000. The reduction of this fund for next year to $50,000, the elimination of the election fund and the proposed reduction in the cost of running the county farm and the court house will likely result in a lower tax levy.

However, an increase in the item of county unit road bonds and interest will be made if the sale of the bonds for the Garrett-Corunna road is completed. Legal technicalities have delayed the acceptance of these bonds so far, but it is believed the sale will be consummated soon. Last year the appropriation for county unit road bonds and interest was $16,940. This money was for the Ditmar and Auburn-Newville roads. Bonds for these roads will again be provided for this year, with the bonds for the Garrett-Helmer road to be added.

An appropriation to be made is $20,000 for county jail bonds. The indebtedness on the jail is now $40,000. With the appropriation this year, the debt will be reduced to $20,000 and it will be wiped out entirely in another year.

Rev. C. H. Havens Is M.P's. New Pastor

Perhaps for the first time in the history of the local M. P. church organization, last Sunday the congregation took action in hiring their pastor for this year, after a trial sermon had been given by Rev. C. H. Havens of Cuba, Ill., which resulted in a unanimous vote for services. Concord did likewise at their evening service.

The new pastor is now preparing his goods to be shipped to St. Joe and his family will occupy the parsonage on Main street. He has a wife and three daughters, the ages of which range from 3 to 10 years.

MINNESOTA FARMERS WIN HONEST BATTLE

Supreme Court Rules Live Stock Exchange at South St. Paul Is Open Market.

Minnesota farmers have won a decisive battle in their fight for public regulation of the markets where their products are sold.

The State Supreme court has handed down a decision upholding the law by which Minnesota declared the South St. Paul live stock exchange to be an open market.

The decision affirms the right of the people to exercise the police powers of their state government in regulating the live stock exchange. "An association of commission men, dealing in live stock at public stockyards, may be required to observe such reasonable regulations as the state sees fit to impose in the exercise of its police power," the Supreme court ruled.

The decision of the high court was handed down in the case of Grisim against the South St. Paul live stock exchange. George Grisim, a member of the exchange, traded with a nonmember in violation of rules of the exchange. The exchange attempted to fine him $250 for breaking its regulations. Mr. Grisim brought court action against the exchange.

Under the "open market" act passed by the state legislature last year as part of the Minnesota Farm Bureau federation's legislative program, the District court issued an order restraining the exchange from collecting the fine. On an appeal to the Supreme court, the decision of the lower court was sustained.

The ruling of the Supreme court on the open market law upholds one of the outstanding laws enacted by the last legislature in response to an overwhelming demand from Minnesota farmers, through their county farm bureaus, for recognition of the people's right to supervise the markets where their food is bought and sold.

The Minnesota Supreme court, in its opinion, referred to court decisions involving the Kansas City exchange, quoting a statement that "the traders who were members of the exchange had never been able to [illegible] members of property without due process of law, by destroying the value of membership. Membership rights, the high court ruled, may be property, but "they are property which is subject to the police power of the state." Property rights are just as much subject to the police power of the people, as exercised through the state, as to the taxing power of the state, the Supreme court held.

The decision upholding the open market law is an agricultural triumph. The first definite result of attacks on the agricultural market laws enacted in Minnesota is victory for the farmers and for the public. It is a sweeping victory for the Minnesota Farm Bureau federation, which organized and led the fight for open markets and the right of the people to supervise the marketing of the food they eat.

PRIZE FOR CHAMPION 1922 CANNING GIRLS

Trip to Europe With All Expenses Paid Is Prize to Be Awarded to Most Efficient.

A free trip to Europe, with all expenses paid, is the prize for the four champion canning girls of the United States in 1922, which has been announced by the national committee of Boys and Girls' Club Work for girls' canning clubs.

Boys and Girls' Club Work is an important project in the program of the American Farm Bureau federation, and the contest is open to all girls who are members of the canning clubs.

This is the largest prize ever offered to the farm girls of America. Fifty-five thousand rural girls who are members of the girls' clubs conducted by agricultural colleges, the United States Department of Agriculture co-operating, are competing in the contest. After the local, county and state elimination contests are held, there will be five interstate or sectional contests, the winners of which will compete for final national honors at Chicago during the week of the International Live Stock exposition. At the final contest the honors and prize trip will be awarded on the basis of efficiency in demonstrating canning methods, in judging canned products and by the home canning record.

The American Committee for Devastated France is providing the prize trip for the four girl winners and for the three women leaders who will train the winning teams.

The unit will leave the United States about June 1, 1923, and will be gone abroad for three months, eight weeks of which will be spent in canning demonstration work in the devastated region in co-operation with the French Department of Agriculture and in visiting many places of interest in our sister republic. The remaining months will be spent in visiting some of the other countries of Europe.

The purpose of the contest, as announced, is to encourage thrift in the conservation of all available products during the season of abundance; to emphasize, through canning, the importance of a well-balanced diet that will make for farm and rural home efficiency; to stimulate a greater interest in canning clubs, and to determine prize winners worthy of a trip to Europe and capable of demonstrating canning to the French people.

The 55,000 canning club girls are a part of [illegible] farm boys and girls in the clubs demonstrating the better farm and home practices under the supervision of the agricultural colleges and the United States Department of Agriculture.

It is estimated that the canning club girls will prepare and preserve [illegible] worth of vegetables and fruits this year.

Looking In on Congress From the House Gallery

SENIORITY

By CONGRESSMAN GUY U. HARDY

Copyright, 1922, Western Newspaper Union.

Seniority or length of service has long been a controlling factor in many things in the house of representatives. I suppose it has always been so more or less, and it is a little more so now than formerly, if possible.

A member gets his office room in the house office building, his seat at committee tables, his rank on his committee, his chairmanship of committee, his place as a conferee on conference committees of the house and senate, and many other little favors and big opportunities for influence through seniority.

There was a time when the speaker had some choice in fixing up committees and chairmanships. You heard Uncle Joe Cannon roundly "cussed" about his exercise of that privilege a few years ago. Even then most of the chairmen were selected because they had served longest on the committees. But the speaker had some latitude and he did make some independent appointments in an effort to put the best qualified man in the place. And often such appointment raised Cain. About twelve years ago there was a revolution, Uncle Joe was defeated for speaker, new rules were adopted. Committee assignments are now made by a large committee on committees and the seniority rule is closely adhered to. There has been but one notable exception in years. The present chairman of appropriations was not the high man but the second high man on the list.

Chairmen of committees have much power and influence in directing legislation. They can help write legislation, help push it through the committee or hold it back. They have charge of it on the floor. Many bills pass the house in one form and the senate in another. If one house refuses to accept the amendments of the other, the bill is sent to conference. Conference committees include three or five members from each house. The house conferees now usually consist of two Republicans and one Democrat or three Republicans and two Democrats who have served longest on the committee. These conferees get together and agree to anything they can and report their findings back. These reports are usually accepted by both houses.

The seniority rule has been much criticised, and there is room for criticism. But there is something to be said for it. Chairmen have the advantage of long experience on their committees. If they are not dubs they must have learned much about the business in hand, and usually dubs do not remain long in congress. Any other method of selection would start log-rolling, build up machinery and factions and breed strife and trouble.

The old members are for the seniority rule, and while the new members may be critical, I rather fancy we will never get far away from it.

However, after all is said, it does sometimes appear that seniority and long service have more influence and power in the house of representatives than brilliancy and ability.

WHEN A CONGRESSMAN DIES

When a congressman dies the house solemnly passes a resolution of acknowledgment and then adjourns. But usually by common consent the resolution is held on the speaker's desk until the business of the day has been completed, and at about 5 or 5:30 o'clock the resolution is read, passed and the house stands adjourned.

The resolution always runs the same. It reads:

"Resolved, That the house has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. Mr. Blank, a representative from the state of ——

"Resolved, That the clerk communicate these resolutions to the senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

"Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this house do now adjourn."

Few things are permitted to interfere with the business of the house. The work goes grinding on through the weeks and months. The house passes laws setting apart holidays that others may rest and celebrate, and revere the memory of notable men, but the house goes on with the nation's business without resting or celebrating.

The house evidently thinks that the [illegible] dead is to go on with its important work. [illegible] his work and memory. Here again the economical tendency of congress is shown, as the day set is always a Sunday when other business is not up for consideration. The speeches delivered on this occasion are published in the Congressional Record, and a little booklet containing them is made up, each member being given a few copies.

The other day I looked up a copy of one of these memorials for a gentleman in Pueblo. It was the memorial address on the life and character of James N. Burns of Missouri, delivered February 23, 1889. Although this was over 33 years ago, I was surprised to note how many gentlemen spoke on that day whose names are well known to us of this day; and some of the addresses are notable examples of eloquence. Ex-Speaker Henderson, Dockery, Holman, Randall, Breckenridge, Butterworth, Stone, Grosvenor, Cockrell, Voorhees, Hale, Gorman and Vest. Surely an array of brilliant names.

It is customary for congress to vote a year's pay to the widow of a deceased member.

There are many deaths in congress. I am told about eighteen a year, and the flag on the house office building flies at half-mast a good deal of the time.

In the present congress there have been twelve deaths and it is only about half over. They are as follows: Fred L. Blackmon of Alabama, Samuel M. Taylor of Arkansas, John A. Elston of California, William E. Mason of Illinois, William H. Frankhauser of Michigan, Charles F. Van de Water of California, Henry D. Flood of Virginia, Prince J. Kuhio Kalanianaole of Hawaii, Lucian W. Parrish of Texas and Samuel M. Brinson of North Carolina.

Two of these members committed suicide and two were killed in automobile accidents.

Over in the senate when a death occurs the governor of the state appoints a senator to fill the vacancy until the next regular state election. A constitutional amendment has been suggested to provide that vacancies in the house should be filled in like manner. Such an arrangement would save the states much money which special elections necessarily cost.

Home Problem of Members.

One of a congressman's little troubles is the home problem, getting a house to live in. Washington is the highest priced city in the country. Property and rents are high. If a man is there alone he can live at a hotel. If he has a family he must have a house or an apartment. The hotels are high priced. The houses and flats are out of sight.

What members pay for houses of course depends upon what they get and want to pay. Several members pay $7,500 a year rent, and quite a number pay from $3,600 to $5,000. Of course they do not live on their salaries. They get something from back home. The members who try to live on their salaries, or nearly so, pay from $150 to $250 a month for a furnished house. And you don't get as much in Washington for $200 a month as you can get in Colorado cities for $50.

Within the moderate prices, houses are very hard to get and usually undesirable. Most residence property in Washington is built in rows—houses in solid blocks like store buildings. They are usually 17 to 20 feet wide, three stories high with three rooms on each floor, windows only in front and back, a front yard 10 or 12 feet deep.

First Congress Met in 1789.

The congress in session at this time is the Sixty-seventh congress. The first congress under the Constitution met in 1789. It should have met on March 4, but a quorum did not show up so it adjourned from day to day until April 1, when it opened for business. On April 6 of that year both houses met in joint session and canvassed the electoral vote for President and vice president. George Washington was found to be elected President and John Adams, vice president.

Congress Lasts Two Years.

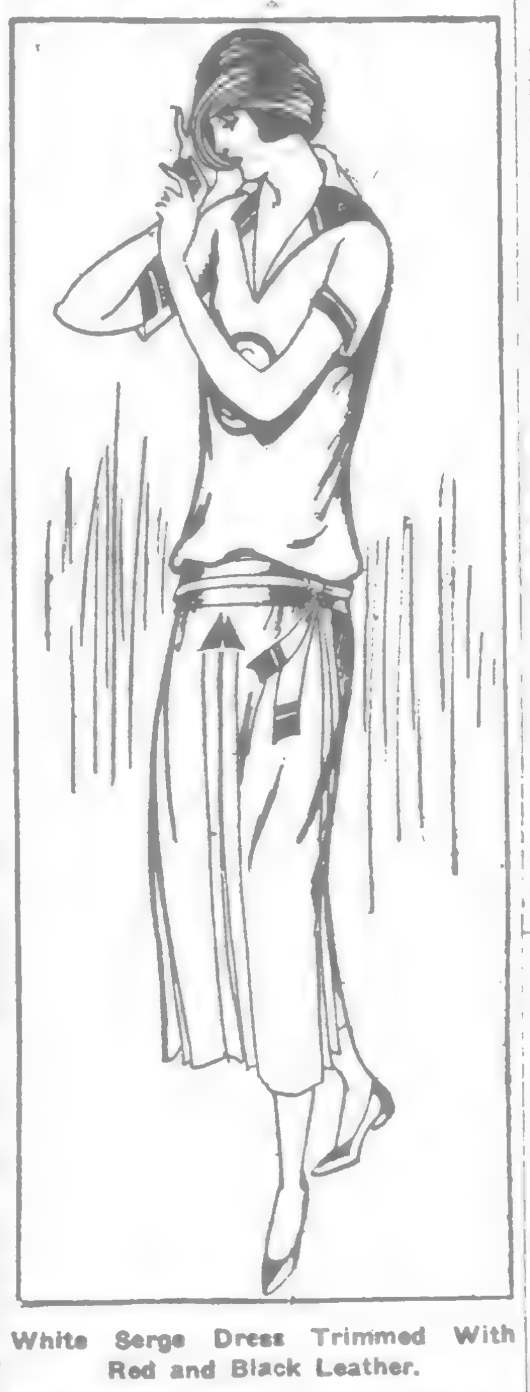
Outing Garb Is in Prime Favor

There is no abatement in the tremendous interest shown in pastime clothes. Women of all ages are selecting them for general day-time wear practically to the exclusion of other types. Even those who have long realized the versatility of clothes of this sort never, in their most sanguine moments, dreamed that they would be adopted in such a world-wide way, declares a fashion writer in the New York Tribune.



White Serge Dress Trimmed With Red and Black Leather.

Paris is competing with London and New York in the making of the smartest and most appealing styles in outdoor clothes. When any type of dress is exploited from all sides it always means that if the models are pretty and becoming a certain number of women will wear them with little sense of fitness. That is, a so-called pastime hat may be worn with a gown to which it is entirely unsuited. This is also true of shoes.

We have cut adrift from the old standards which governed the selection of footwear. The final blow was dealt with the wholesale adoption of patent leather for low-heeled walking shoes. With the flooding of the market with many excellent ideas in dress at one time there always comes a misapplication of the best of them.

Both sweaters and dresses are made in two or more contrasting colors; that is, of silk or wool in a plain color patterned in high relief.

Among the prettiest of the sweaters are those in lavender brocaded in blue. A new model in these shades which closes down the front like the very old-fashioned coat sweater is long, coming almost to the knees, and has long sleeves which flare at the bottom. There is a high collar buttoning up about the neck. The sweater itself is lavender and around the bottom and on the sleeves and the collar are squares knitted in blue. It is bloused by means of an elastic band placed low on the inside.

White Flannel and Serge.

A great demand for any particular type of dress is a wonderful inspiration to designers and manufacturers and an incentive to do their best in that particular line. While there is the greatest diversity of color in the outing costume, here as everywhere else, a few colors become the extreme of fashion. In the plain shades brown, gray and white are favorite, while in the brighter hues there are unusual shades of cerise, purple, yellow and red. Emphasis is placed on yellow and black used in unison.

A complete reaction from black in daytime clothes is manifesting itself in the other extreme, white, for street wear, particularly white with color. And on this wave comes white-flannel as well as white-serge of an extremely soft and fine texture woven in part of camel's hair, which, mixed with the wool, gives a marvelous effect. The kasha serge of Rodier is of this character.

Jeanne Lanvin has been responsible largely for this movement to white serge and flannel with trimmings of embroidery in high colors, a trimming which she always has favored and in which she ever is a [illegible]. One of her best models [illegible] nised the desirability of flannel for outdoor skirts, jackets and frocks, and this season sees them adopted in a larger way than ever before. Many American women have felt that flannel was not the most practical material.

Mexican Drawn Work.

Few women realize that the Viyella flannels are absolutely unshrinkable if properly laundered and that they come in a large variety of styles and weights. It is possible to obtain the creamy white shades in six different weights. Then there are the stripes, the checks and the Scotch tartan plaids, in addition to the heavy or suiting weights in both white and fancy checks. Smart costumes consisting of a dress and cape are developed from the lighter-weight flannels in both the white and ivory shades and topped with hats of a vivid hue.

Crepe de chine and crepe marocain still are very important fabrics for the development of pastime clothes. Lanvin has made a beautiful model in two shades of crepe marocain. The blouse is of bright red, while the skirt is cream white. The bodice is made to slip on over the head and cut in pointed scallops at the bottom. The sleeves are finished in like manner. The girdle consists of a narrow strip of the white silk run through medallion slides of coral-colored composition. The skirt has a plaited front panel set in with hemstitching and Mexican drawn work—types of trimming which are very popular just now.

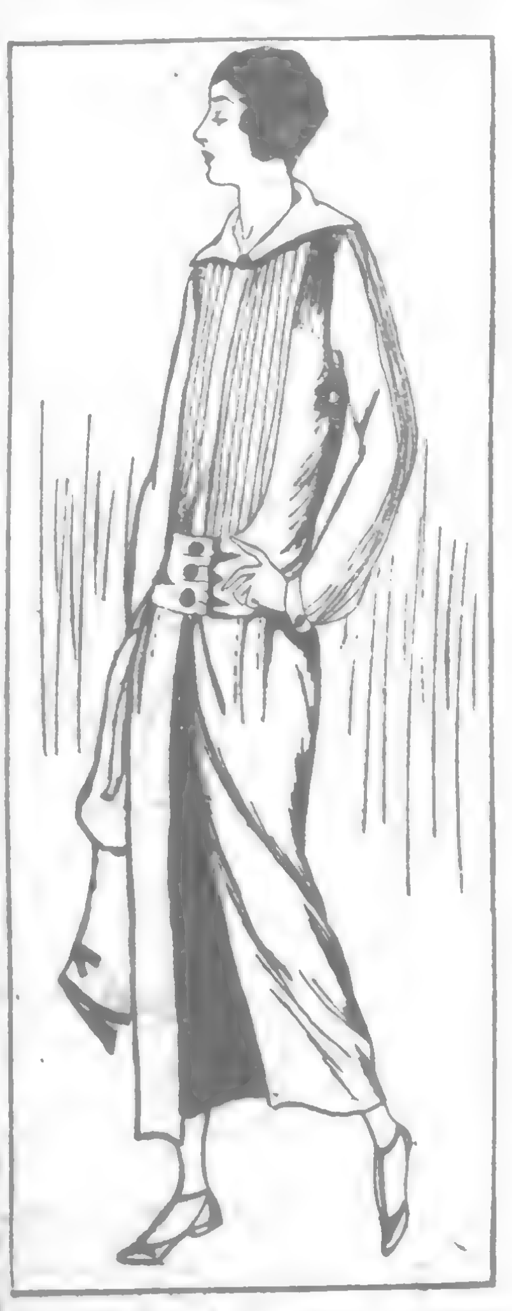
Trimmed With Red Cire Braid.

Another successful Lanvin model also is developed in crepe marocain in two colors, but in this instance yellow and white are chosen, the blouse being in citron yellow trimmed with black and the skirt in pure white.

Jean Patou has been featuring the three-piece suit in his summer collection. In one of Patou's best models of this sort white serge is the material used and the trimming is red cire braid. The lining of the jacket and the foundation skirt are of red silk; the blouse is of white crepe georgette.

Patou in many of his recent models has shown an extreme fondness for red. He apparently never misses an opportunity to use this color with good effect. It is pleasingly exploited in a jacket and dress. These two make up a costume developed in white and red serge. The loose-fitting jacket is of the red material trimmed with black and red leather, while the dress is of white serge with leather trimming.

An interesting idea in connection with daytime garments is the use of large embroidered open-work monograms placed on the center of the blouse just beneath the pointed V collar. This idea is also shown in knitted garments.



Another Winsome Costume Trimmed With Red Cire Braid.

Enormous Hats.

One of the enormous hats beneath which the Parisienne hides herself at present has almost the proportions and half the characteristics of a tent. In black, for example, it has a large, crushed crown of satin rising very high and spreading very wide. Below this spreads a huge expanse of brim, half the size of a parasol. And from the tent-like brim hang curtains of beautiful black lace, falling in front almost to the nose and in back almost to the waist.

All-White.

All-white costumes are very fashionable. Sometimes a bright-colored [illegible] lining to the cape, [illegible] note.

"YOUNG MAILLARD!"

SYNOPSIS.—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season Jachin Fell, wealthy though somewhat mysterious citizen, and Dr. Ansley, are discussing a series of robberies by an individual known as the Midnight Masquer, who, invariably attired as an aviator, has long defied the police. Joseph Maillard, wealthy banker, is giving a ball that night, at which the Masquer has threatened to appear and rob the guests. Fell and Ansley, on their way to the affair, meet a girl dressed as Columbine, seemingly known to Fell, but masked, who accompanies them to the ball. Lucie Ledanois, recently the ward of her uncle, Joseph Maillard, is the Columbine. At the ball, Bob Maillard, son of the banker, again proposes to her and is refused. He offers to buy some of her property. A Franciscan monk interests her. He turns out to be Prince Gramont. In his library Joseph Maillard and a group of his friends are held up and robbed by the Midnight Masquer. Lucie Ledanois, the last of an old family, is in straitened circumstances. Joseph Maillard's handling of her funds has been unfortunate. Fell is an old friend of her parents and deeply interested in the girl. Henry Gramont, really the Prince de Gramont, is enamored of Lucie. Lucie talks with Fell about her affairs and the Masked Masquer. Gramont's chauffeur, Hammond, sergeant in the A. E. F., lives with him. He was the original Midnight Masquer, and Gramont had assumed the role. Where Hammond had been a robber for financial gain, Gramont, of course, is not. He arranges to return the "loot" to those whom he has robbed.

"Well, I was followed today; at least, I think I was. And let me tell you something about that same quiet little man! His name is Jachin Fell."

"Heluva name," commented Hammond, and wrinkled up his brow. "Jachin, huh? Seems like I've heard the name before. Out o' the Bible, ain't it? Something about Jachin and Boaz?"

"I imagine so." Gramont smiled as he replied. "This chap Fell is sharp, confoundedly sharp!" he went on, while the chauffeur listened with frowning intentness. "I think that he is on to me, and is trying to get the goods on me."

"Oh!" said Hammond. "And someone was trailin' you? Think he's put the bulls wise?"

Gramont shrugged his shoulders. "I don't know. He almost caught me last night. We'll have to get rid of that aviator's suit at once, and of the loot also. I suppose you've reconciled yourself to returning the stuff?"

Hammond stirred uneasily, and laid down his pipe.

"Look here, cap'n," he said, earnestly. "I wasn't runnin' a holdup game because I liked it, and I wasn't doing it for the fun of the thing, like you are. I was dead broke, I hadn't any hope left, and I didn't care a d—n whether I lived or died—that's on the dead! Right there, you come along and picked me up.

"You give me a job. What's more, you've treated me white, cap'n. You've given me something decent to live for—to make good because you got some faith in me! Why, when you went out on that first job of ours, d'you know it like to broke me up? It did. Only, when we got home that night and you said it was all a joke, and you'd send back the loot later on, then I began to feel better about it."

Gramont nodded in comprehension of the other's feeling.

"It's not been altogether a joke, sergeant," he said, gravely. "To tell the truth, I did start it as a joke, but soon afterward I learned something that led me to keep it up. I kept it up until I could hit the Maillard house. It was my intention to turn up at the Comus ball, on Tuesday night, and there make public restitution of the stuff—but that's impossible now. I dare not risk it! That man Fell is too smart."

"You're not goin' to pull the trick again, then?" queried Hammond, eagerly.

"No. I'm through. I've got what I wanted. Still, I don't wish to return the stuff before Wednesday—Ash Wednesday, the end of the carnival season. Suppose you get out the loot and find me some boxes. And be sure they have no name on them or any store labels."

Hammond leaped up and vanished in the room adjoining. Presently he returned, bearing several cardboard boxes, which he dumped on the center table. "I'm [illegible] glad you're done, believe me!" he [illegible] [illegible]

"Sure, I'll be writing some notes to go inside."

Gramont went to a buhl writing desk in the corner of the room, and sat down. He took out his notebook, tore off several sheets, and from his pocket produced a pencil having an extremely hard lead. He wrote a number of notes, which, except for the addresses, were identical in content:

"Dear Sir:

"I inclose herewith certain jewelry and articles, also currency, recently obtained by me under your kind auspices.

"I trust that you will assume the responsibility of returning these things to the various guests who lost them while under your roof. I regret any discomfort occasioned by my taking them as a loan, which I now return. Please convey to the several owners my profound esteem and my assurance that I shall not in future appear to trouble anyone, the carnival season having come to an end, and with it my little jest.

"THE MIDNIGHT MASQUER."

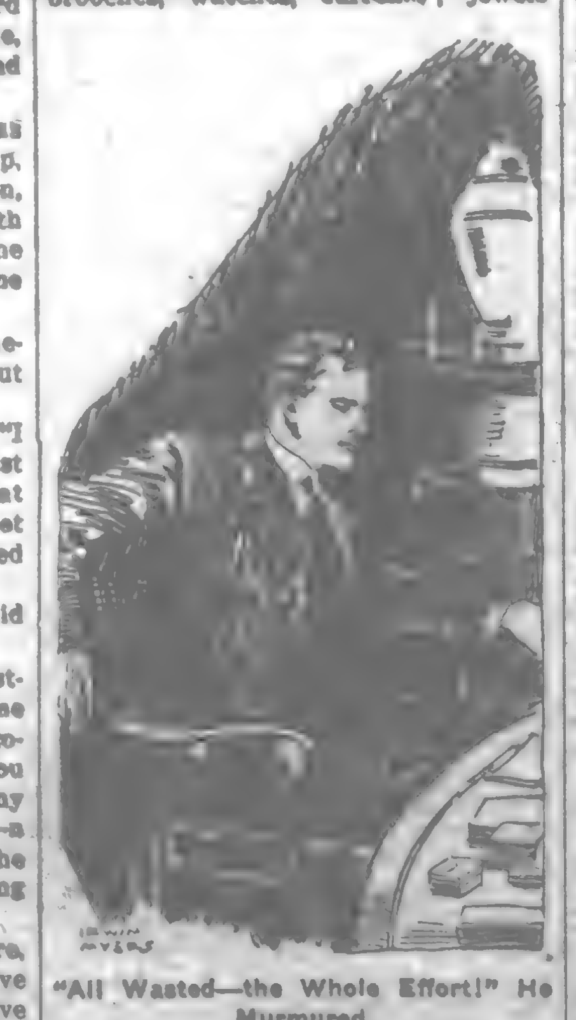
Gathering up these notes in his hand, Gramont went to the fireplace. He tossed the pencil into the fire, following it with the notebook.

"Can't take chances with that man Fell," he explained. "All ready, sergeant. Let's go down the list one by one."

From the trunk Hammond produced ticketed packages, which he placed on the table. Gramont selected one, opened it, carefully packed the contents in one of the boxes, placed the proper addressed note on top, and handed it to the chauffeur.

"Wrap it up and address it. Give the return address of John Smith, Bayou Teche."

One by one they went through the packages of loot in the same manner. Before them on the table, as they worked, glittered little heaps of rings, brooches, watches, currency; jewels that flashed garishly with colored fires, historic and famous jewels plucked from the aristocratic heart of the southland, heirlooms of a past generation side by side with platinum crudities of the present fashion.



"All Wasted—the Whole Effort!" He Murmured.

There had been heartburnings in the loss of these things, Gramont knew. He could picture to himself something of what had followed his robberies: family quarrels, new purchases in the gem marts, bitter reproaches, fresh mortgages on old heritages, vexations of wealthy dowagers, shrugs of unconcern by the nouveaxx riches; perchance lives altered—divorces—

"There's a lot of human life behind these baubles, sergeant," he reflected aloud, a cold smile upon his lips as he worked. "When they come back to their owners, I'd like to be hovering around in an invisible mantle to watch results! Could we only know it, we're probably affecting the lives of a great many people—for good and ill. These things stand for money; and there's nothing like money or the lack of it to guide the destinies of people."

"You said it," and [illegible]

"These papers, sergeant. To get them, I've been playing the whole game. To get them and not to let their owner suspect that I was after them! Now they're going back to their owner."

"Who's he?" demanded Hammond.

"Young Maillard—son of the banker. He roped me into an oil company; caught me, like a sucker, almost the first week I was here. I put pretty near my whole wad into that company of his."

"You mean he stung you?"

"Not yet." Gramont smiled coldly, harshly. "I fell right enough—but I'll come out on top of the heap."

The other frowned. "I don't get you, cap'n. Some kind o' stock deal?"

"Yes, and no." Gramont paused, and seemed to choose his words with care. "Miss Ledanois, the lady who was driving with us this afternoon, is an old friend of mine. I've known for some time that somebody was fleecing her. I suspected that it was Maillard the elder, for he has had the handling of her affairs for some time past. Now, however, those papers have given me the truth. He was straight enough with her; his son was the man.

"He worked on his father, made his father sell land owned by Miss Ledanois, and he himself reaped the profits. There are notes and stock issues among these papers that give his whole game away, to my eyes. By the way, get that tin box out of my trunk, will you? I want to take my stock certificates with me in the morning, and must not forget them."

Hammond disappeared into the adjoining room.

Gramont sat gazing at the boxes before him. He shook his head gloomily, and his eyes clouded.

"All wasted—the whole effort!" he murmured. "I thought it might lead to something, but all it has given me is the reward of saving myself and possibly retrieving Lucie. As for the larger game, the bigger quarry—it's all wasted. I haven't unraveled a single thread; the first real clue came to me tonight, purely by accident. Memphis Izzy Gumberts! That's the lead to follow! I'll get rid of this Midnight Masquer foolishness and go after the real game."

Gramont was to discover that it is not nearly so easy to be rid of folly as it is to don the jester's cap and bells; a fact which one Simplicissimus had discovered to his sorrow three hundred years earlier. But, as Gramont was not versed in the line of literature, he yet had the discovery ahead of him.

Hammond re-entered the room with the tin box, from which Gramont took his stock certificates issued by Bob Maillard's oil company. He pocketed the shares.

"I'll go to Maillard the banker—Joseph Maillard—first thing in the morning, and offer him my stock. He'll be mighty glad to get it at a discount, knowing that it is in his son's company. You see, the son doesn't confide in the old man particularly. I'll let the father win a little money on the deal with me, and by doing this I'll manage to save the greater part of my investment—"

"Holy mackerel!" Hammond exploded in a burst of laughter as he caught the idea. "Say, if this ain't the richest thing ever pulled! When the crash comes, the fancy kid will be stinging his dad good and hard, eh?"

"Exactly; and I think his dad can afford to be stung much better than I can," agreed Gramont, cheerfully. "Now let's take those packages and stow them away in the luggage compartment of the car. I'm getting nervous at the thought of having them around here, and they'll be perfectly safe there overnight—safer there than here, in fact. Tomorrow you can take the car out of town and send the packages by parcels post from some small town.

"In that way they ought to be delivered here on Wednesday. You'd better wear one of my suits, leaving your chauffeur's outfit here, and don't halt the car in front of the post office where you mail the packages—"

"I get you," assented Hammond, sagely. "But what about them aviator's clothes?"

"Take them with you—better get them wrapped up here and now. You can toss them into a ditch anywhere."

Hammond obeyed.

Ten minutes afterward the two men left the room, carrying the packages of loot and the bundle containing the aviator's uniform. They descended to the courtyard in the rear of the house. Here was a small garden, with a fountain in its center. Behind this were the stables, which had long been disused as such, and which were now occupied only by the car of Gramont.

It was with undisguised relief that Gramont now saw the stuff actually out of the house. Within the last few hours he had become intensely afraid of Jachin Fell. Concentrating himself upon the man, picking up information guardedly, he had that day accumulated many small items which increased his sense of peril from that quarter. Straws, no more, but quite significant straws. Gramont realized clearly that if the police ever searched his rooms and found this loot, he would be lost. There could be no excuse that would hold water for a moment against such evidence.

Shame on Them.

PERHAPS there are a few mothers who do not know the virtues of Fletcher's Castoria. Perhaps there are a few who know that there are imitations on the market, and knowing this demand Fletcher's. It is to ALL motherhood, then, that we call attention to the numerous imitations and counterfeits that may be set before them.

It is to all motherhood everywhere that we ring out the warning to beware of the "Just-as-good". For over thirty years Fletcher's Castoria has been an aid in the upbuilding of our population; an aid in the saving of babies.

And yet there are those who would ask you to try something new. Try this. Try that. Even try the same remedy for the tiny, scarcely breathing, babe that you in all your robust womanhood would use for yourself. Shame on them.

BEAMS

Henry W. Beams was born in Adams Co., Penn., September 30, 1846, and passed away at his home in Spencerville, Ind., August 19, 1922, aged 75 years, 10 months and 19 days. He was a son of John and Barbara Beams. He was one of ten children, two only of whom remain.

He came with his parents to Indiana in 1850 and settled in Cedar Creek township, Allen county.

He received a common school education but continued to apply himself to the acquirement of useful knowledge and became a well informed man in all of the ordinary affairs of life.

February 3, 1870, he was married to Anna E. George, who died January 18, 1877, leaving a child, Armedia E. Beams, five days old. On November 4, 1877, he was married to Rebecca A. Johnson. To this union were born two children, Franklin L. and George H. Beams, who, along with the wife, remain to mourn their loss. He also leaves eight grandchildren, two sisters, Mrs. Sarah Phillips of near here and Mrs. Catherine Walker of Hicksville, O. His daughter Armedia passed away May 19, 1904.

He moved to Spencerville, Nov. 4, 1890, having been engaged in business prior to this, viz: the undertaking and furniture business and also a part owner of a general store. The undertaking and furniture business were disposed of in May 1920, the store being retained.

He succeeded as a farmer and merchant and by his energy and fair dealing kept himself in comfortable circumstances. He was a good citizen and took an active interest in the affairs of state and was especially interested in the advancement of the welfare of his home town. He was a good neighbor and a kind friend to all.

He was indeed a family man. He lived for his family and his chief joy was in his home. He was especially devoted to his grandchildren.

He joined the Lutheran church at Spencerville when 19 years old and it can be truthfully said that he remained faithful to the end of his life. He held every office in the local church, was a delegate to the synod on many occasions, chairman of the joint council, Sunday school superintendent for many years and teacher of long service. His was the home of the preachers among whom he was well and favorably known.

He was sick a long time but bore it with Christian patience. His last hours were peaceful and now he rests safe in the arms of Jesus.

The funeral services were held from the Lutheran church on Tuesday of last week at 10 o'clock a. m., Rev. S. D. Steffey officiating. Interment was made in the White City cemetery.

EMPHASIS ON FIELD SELECTION OF SEED CORN IN ALL STATES

Selecting Corn for Seed in the Field.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

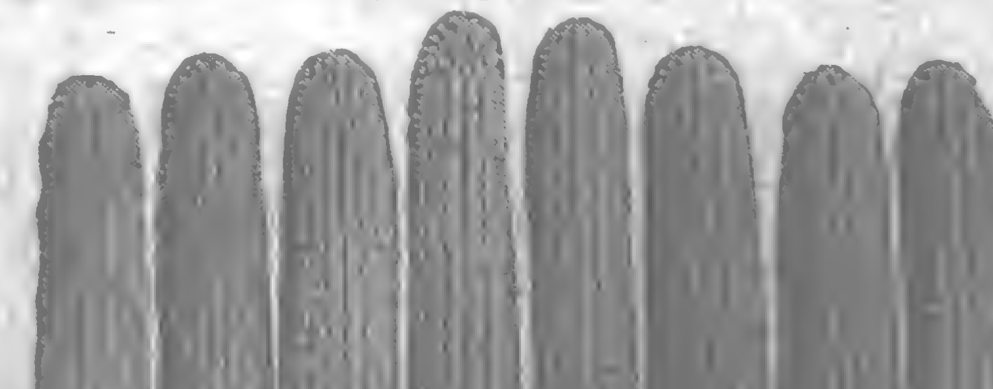
Seed corn for next season's planting should be selected in the field from the standing stalks in September. The disappointing search for good seed corn every spring should be a sufficient reason for following this practice, strongly advocated by the United States Department of Agriculture. Any intelligent farmer can go into his own cornfield when the corn is mature and select high-grade seed if he has planted suitable types of corn and cultivated properly. If he has joined a county movement to develop certain standard varieties of corn which grow in that locality, and if he has raised these strains on his own land, he may reasonably expect a market for any surplus seed.

County Agents Report Progress.

Various methods were followed last fall by the county agents of the Northern and Western states in their efforts to convince the farmers that field selection of corn was a good thing which would amply pay for any trouble involved. Similar tactics may well be used this season where for one reason or another the local people are not in the habit of field-selecting their seed corn.

In Steele county, Minnesota, selection between September 10 and September 20 was urged. The week of September 24 was chosen as "good seed corn week" in Nance county, Nebraska. It seems likely that the corresponding dates this year will be the best time to go out into the field and choose the most promising ears, noting the character of the plants on which they grow and the details which indicate a vigorous and healthy condition.

The county agent for Dakota county, Minnesota, reports that a permanent and reliable source of seed corn is being developed by getting certain farmers in the county to specialize in seed corn week. They are asked to produce a dependable type of improved corn and to put in facilities for drying and storing it properly. The average farmers are also encouraged to select their own seed, but the definite work of safeguarding the seed corn supply of the county is being carried on with a few men who are really competent to produce certified seed corn and equipped to handle it. Eventually it is hoped that there will be a man in every township doing this seed corn work and, where possible, having seed corn houses in which to dry it.



Farmer Should Endeavor to Strike an Average of Good Ears Like These.

In Scott county, Minnesota, last year, 4,300 acres of selected seed were planted. For their 1921 planting 32 farmers field-selected their seed corn, and all had a surplus to sell. Stearns county has 31 co-operators in seed corn work. Minnesota No. 13, Rustless White Dent, and Northwestern Dent were the varieties used. Some of this certified seed was awarded to [illegible] growers with their farm bureau re-[illegible] in the winter bring the best ten ears to the local county schools where shows will be held. The best ten ears from each school will then compete with the other schools of the township and the best from the town with the rest of the county. Six hundred and thirty-nine youngsters promised to try.

The agent for Washington county, Indiana, mailed circular letters and publications on the subject to all the farmers of his county in the fall, and had demonstrations given at the schools for the younger generation. The rural teachers in this county include seed selection of corn as a project in their agricultural work.

In spite of the development of a very successful central seed corn testing association in Rush county, Indiana, for several years, it is the opinion of the county agent that the testing alone cannot be depended on for eliminating corn diseases. Soil conditions and the heredity of the seed corn are factors which affect the growth of the corn, and the latter of these can be controlled by more careful selection of seed corn in the fall from the field.

Field Selection in Some New Places.

A great deal of interest was manifested in six field demonstrations of seed-corn selection held in Cass county, Missouri. This line of work was entirely new to many of the farmers present. Those who participated in the 200 bushels selected were further convinced of the value of early seed selection from the stalks, because of the adverse weather conditions later in the fall. The autumn was abnormally wet in this section, and the corn matured slowly; then an early freeze in November caused a low percentage of germination in seed selected haphazard in the ordinary way after gathering the corn.

In Mississippi county, Missouri, the work done in relation to the field-crops project in 1920 was mainly concentrated upon field selection of corn. This was carried out through community meetings which were held in co-operation with the county school superintendent. The advantages of the method to the individual farmer were considered paramount, and the improvement of seed corn in the county was also stressed. The demonstrations showed also how field selection would help to eliminate corn-root rot, if ears were selected from stalks that were vigorous and not ripening prematurely and on [illegible] that showed no evidence of decay.

Co-Operation by Written Agreement.

The county agent for Huerfano county, Colorado, visited 20 farmers last year who were among the leading corn growers and made written agreements with each, whereby they promised to raise their seed according to the usual method of [illegible], select seed corn in the field and store it in a dry place where [illegible]

RADIO

AUDIO FREQUENCY AMPLIFIER UNITS

Construction of Two Is Described, With the Materials That Must Be Purchased.

Theoretically any number of transformer coupled stages of audio frequency amplification can be used. However, due to the amplification of static disturbances, power line induction, tube noises, etc., three stages are about the practical limit. If more than three stages are used the noises become so loud in comparison with the signal that it is difficult to hear the signal.

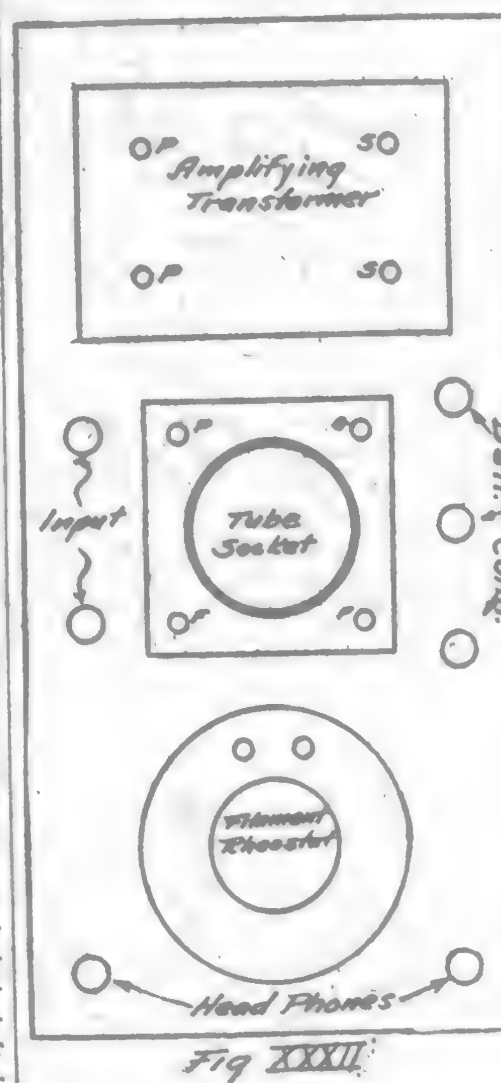

Fig XXXII

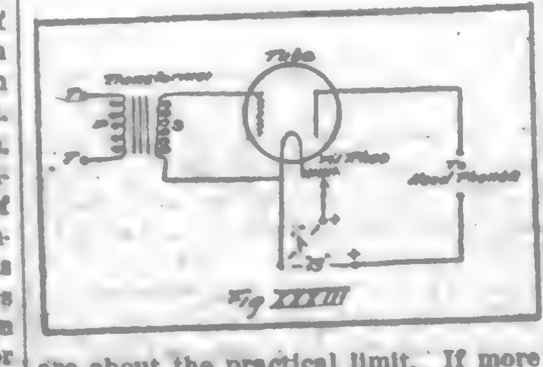

Fig XXXIII

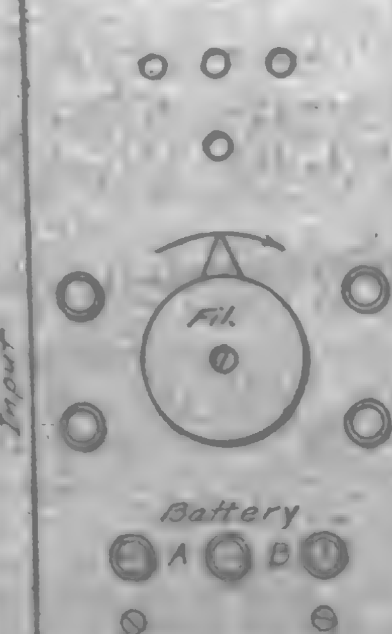
Since audio frequency amplifying transformers can be purchased at any radio shop and the simplest method of coupling, the construction of two audio frequency amplifier units will be described.

The first unit will be arranged to be used in conjunction with the vacuum tube receiver mounted on the eight-inch square horizontal base board, previously mentioned in this column. The second unit will be mounted on a vertical panel four inches wide and six inches high to "match up" with the six-by-eight vertical panel vacuum tube described recently in this column.

The following standard apparatus will have to be purchased at a radio supply store in order to construct an amplifier unit to be used in conjunction with either receiver.



Panel Layout of Amplifier Unit Fig. XXXIV

One amplifying transformer, cost about $5.

One vacuum tube (for amplifier), cost [illegible]

One [illegible] cost $1.

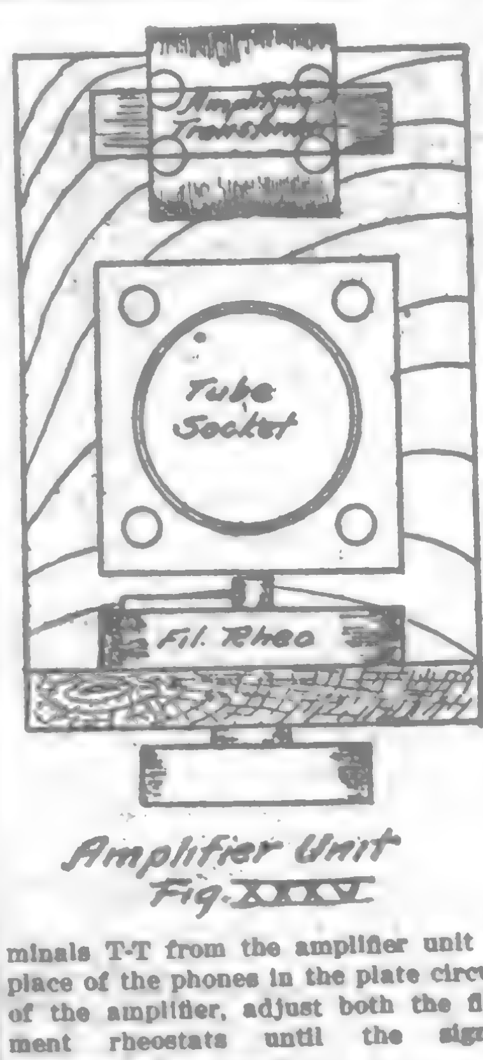
Seven binding posts, cost about 70 cents.

The amplifier unit to be used with the eight-inch square horizontal baseboard is mounted on a base three inches wide and six inches long. The tube filament rheostat is mounted in the front, the amplifying transformers in the back and the tube in the center.

Fig. XXXII shows the relative position of the transformer tube socket and filament rheostat when mounted on the baseboard. A diagram of connections of the amplifier unit is shown in Fig. XXXIII. The input coming from the terminals of the receiver that were originally connected to the telephone receivers is connected to the terminals of the amplifying transformer. One side of the secondary of the amplifying transformer is connected to the grid, and the other side of the secondary to the filament and common battery lead. The filament rheostat is in series with the positive side of the filament. The plate terminal on the tube socket is connected to one side of the phone, the other side of the phone being connected to the positive side of a 45-volt "B" battery. Use a "hard" tube as an amplifier.

When using the amplifier unit for the first time, tune the receiver with the detector only. To connect the terminals T-T from the amplifier unit in place of the phones in the plate circuit of the amplifier, adjust both the filament rheostats until the signal strength is maximum.



Amplifier Unit Fig. XXXV

If it is desired to still further amplify the incoming signal two amplifier units can be constructed, the output of each unit being connected to the input of the next, and the phones being placed in the plate circuit of the last amplifier tube.

In constructing the second unit make the panel and the baseboard of the same thickness, kind of wood, and finish as used for the receiver. The panel should be four inches wide and six inches high, the baseboard three inches wide and four inches deep to "match up." Use the same kinds of binding posts and filament rheostat that were used on the receiver.

Fig. XXXIV is a plan view of the amplifier unit, and Fig. XXXV is an elevation of the front view of the panel. The diagram of connections is, of course, the same as for the previously described unit and is shown in Fig. XXXIII.

These amplifier units can be used in conjunction with any radio receiver. The same units connected electrically as shown in Fig. XXXIII can be mounted to suit the builders' own taste.

TIPS FOR FANS

A radio amateur in France has tough luck. He can't send at all and is not permitted to listen in on certain government transmitting stations.

A condemned murderer in a Boston jail is spending his remaining hours in the construction of a radio receiving set so that the inmates may enjoy programs during their hours of unemployment.

Despite all advice to the contrary, people still insist on using dry cells for the filament supply of vacuum tubes. The batteries will hold up for about five minutes and then they will slowly [illegible], until nothing at all can be heard.

LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 3

NEHEMIAH REBUILDS THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM

LESSON TEXT—Neh. 3:1-7:4.

GOLDEN TEXT—Our God will fight for us.—Neh. 4:20.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Neh. 2:9-20; I Cor. 3:9-17.

PRIMARY TOPIC—How God helped Nehemiah Build a Wall.

JUNIOR TOPIC—How a City Wall Was Rebuilt.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Praying, Watching, Working.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Success Through Leadership and Co-operation.

Having secured a leave of absence from the Persian court, and credentials from the king, Nehemiah journeyed to Jerusalem. After resting three days without disclosing his purpose to any one, he made a survey of the walls by night. Having thus obtained first-hand information he called the representatives of the Jews together and said, "Let us build the walls of Jerusalem." He then made known the hand of providence in bringing him to Jerusalem with the authority to rebuild its walls. He thus showed great wisdom in finding out for himself the real conditions and what work would be required to restore the walls. The one who is qualified to lead in a great undertaking is the one who has mastered the situation and is thus able to remove objections and show how the work can be done.

I.—Preparation for the Building (ch. 3).

The division of labor in this project shows Nehemiah's administrative ability. A wise distribution of labor makes difficult tasks easy.

Note some outstanding features of this great work.

1. Stress Laid Upon Indifference (3:5) In administrative tasks it is just that unfaithfulness should be pointed out. Such action will be a warning to some and an encouragement to others by showing the integrity of the director.

2. Help Rendered by the Women (3:12). Perhaps Shallum had no sons to aid him. It is a fine thing for women to be able to take hold even in building a wall when there are no men to do it. God's word carefully notes such extraordinary acts.

3. Stress Laid Upon Earnestness of Some (3:20). If one knows that his faithfulness will be recognized he will earnestly pursue his tasks.

4. Every One Built Over Against His Own House (3:10, 23, 28). Man's chief concern is for his family. No incentive to exertion is quite so strong as that which concerns his own family.

5. Certain Guilds of Men Undertook Certain Work (ch. 3:8, 31, 32). Wise administration sometimes calls for such alignment of efforts. Men of the same class and craft will usually work better together.

II. Hindrances Encountered (4:1-6:14).

1. Scoffing of Sanballot and Tobiah (4:1-6; cf. 2:19-20). The opposers of God's servants usually begin by hurling at them shafts of ridicule. They called the Jews but a feeble folk and asserted that the tread of a prowling fox would break down their stone wall.

2. Conspiracy of a Sudden Attack (4:7-9). When the enemy saw that the work was actually succeeding they changed from ridicule to an attempt to throw the workmen into a panic and thus hinder the work. When the enemy cannot succeed by scoffing then he resorts to intimidation.

3. Conspiracy With the Jews (4:10-23). They sought by means of the Jews from the outside to discourage their brethren by showing that the task was hopeless and that at any time they were subject to a sudden and secret attack.

4. Greed and Oppression of the Rulers (5:1-13). The Jews of that day, like the profiteers in the recent World war, took advantage of the poor and oppressed them so that they mortgaged their land and sold their daughters into slavery. Nehemiah [illegible] rebuked them for their crimes and ordered a restoration to be made, [illegible] an oath of them that they [illegible] their promises.

5. [illegible] to Take Nehemiah's Life [illegible]. When [illegible] and Tobiah [illegible] every other way they sought [illegible] to get Nehemiah away that [illegible]

[illegible] Completed (6:15-7:4). [illegible] they pursue [illegible] days the [illegible] the enemies [illegible] of all their [illegible] for they [illegible] was of God.

INDIANA State Happenings

Indianapolis.—Five hundred cars of coal was mined in Indiana the first day the mines were open following state settlement of the miners' strike, David Matthews, member of the state coal emergency committee, declared. Normal capacity production of 100,000 tons daily will be reached in a short time, Mr. Matthews said. Because of this state production and because of technical difficulties encountered by the committee in securing emergency coal through the federal coal distribution agencies at Washington, plans for securing emergency fuel were cancelled by the state committee.

Shelbyville.—Agents of the United States Department of Agriculture, who have been searching in Indiana for traces of the European corn borer, recently spent two days in Shelby county. Cornfields in several localities were inspected. The men said that the European borer usually works in sugar corn, of which there are more than 8,000 acres in Shelby county. The agents reported that they found no trace of the European borer in that county or in other parts of the state. Last year the borer was found in Ohio within a few miles of the Indiana line.

Indianapolis.—Since August 1 federal prohibition agents, working in the vicinity of Clinton, have destroyed 66 stills and 1,500 barrels of mash, Bert C. Morgan, federal prohibition director for Indiana, said. The transportation of intoxicating liquor in the interior part of Indiana has greatly decreased in recent months, Mr. Morgan says. Reports to him from Gary and other places in the northern part of the state are that much liquor is being received and that wine is being sold at $2 a quart.

South Bend.—St. Joseph county's wheat yield is a disappointment. Indications in the early season that the crop would be a bumper, however, were not carried out by the harvest and the best yields failed to exceed 20 bushels to the acre. The fault was chiefly due to the failure of the heads to fill out. The yield of rye is also a disappointment. Dry weather, rust and fungus disease have decreased the yield, according to the St. Joseph farm bureau. The yield of oats is still uncertain.

Evansville.—Railroad detectives reported that at a point near St. Philips eight spikes and one splice had been removed from the tracks of the St. Louis division of the Louisville & Nashville railroad. The discovery was made by track walkers a short time before a passenger train was scheduled to pass. Detectives believe that it had been planned to wreck the passenger train.

Indianapolis.—Jesse E. Eschbach, chief examiner of the state board of accounts, charged that there have "gross irregularities and illegalities in the transaction of the affairs" of Clark county, in a letter sent to Thomas L. Stoner, Clark county auditor, and members of the board of county commissioners. The letter was based on the finding of a report of field examiners of the accounts board.

Indianapolis.—All advertising signs within the right-of-way of state highways will have been removed by the end of August, A. H. Hinkle, director of the maintenance division of the state highway department, has announced. An order to remove all advertising signs, bulletins and posters from state highways was issued by the state highway commission about a year ago, to take effect July 1.

Evansville.—With markets flooded with fruits, vegetables and produce, due to the inability of the railroads to supply cars, the bottom has been knocked out of prices on these products, according to Evansville grocers. Vegetables and fruits are being sold for 50 per cent less than they were this time last year. There has been a big drop in the prices of watermelons and cantaloupes.

Marion.—Members of the Winters family, the last surviving Grant county family of the Miami Indian tribe, which settled in this part of the country when Indiana was still a wilderness, recently gathered at the old Indian burying ground, near Jalapa, and made plans for the preservation of the historic spot in which is buried Meshingomesia, the famous Miami chief, and more than 100 other Miamis [illegible]

Indianapolis.—John D. W[illegible], director of the state highway commission; A. H. Hinkle, chief engineer of maintenance of state highways, and W. B. Titus, chief engineer of state highway bridge construction, went to Illinois to study the results being obtained on the Bates experimental road, two miles long, near Springfield.

Indianapolis.—Warning that all school [illegible]

Anderson.—Madison county now has three women serving as township trustees. William L. Garic, trustee of Van Buren township, resigned recently in order to sign a contract to teach school at Summitville. His wife was appointed as his successor by the county commissioners. Several months ago Mrs. Alta House was appointed to succeed her husband, J. C. House, as trustee of Green township. Mr. House now is superintendent of Madison county schools. More than a year ago Mrs. Margaret Boone was appointed trustee of Pike Creek township, succeeding Harrison Boone, her husband, who died.

Lafayette.—A catfish weighing 45 pounds was caught in the Wabash river at Lafayette a few days ago by Harry O'Connor. It was the largest fish taken from the river in recent years. O'Connor presented it to the city and it will be placed on exhibition in a special pool at Columbian park. Fish weighing 25 pounds have been caught in recent years, but nothing approaching O'Connor's catch in size. It was caught a few rods from the business district.

Gary.—Official investigation of the wreck of a New York-Chicago express train on the Michigan Central railroad a mile east of this city, in which two trainmen were killed and three others injured, was started by county officials. Railroad officials and Gary police believe that the wreck was the result of a plot. Edward Coy, engineer, and Frank Lubbs, firemen, both of Niles, Mich., were buried in the wreckage of the engine, and it was hours before their bodies were recovered.

Laporte.—An increase of $21,518.18 in the 1923 budget for the school city of Laporte over that of 1922, making a 18½ per cent increase in the tax levy on each $100 valuation, became known when the school budget was completed. The increased cost, according to Superintendent E. B. Wetherow, is due to the money which must be raised to meet the interest on $290,000 school bonds issued to pay for a new high school building.

Gary.—The Liberty Building and Loan association of Gary was closed by the state banking department. It is said the association was in bad financial condition and that members failed to contribute their usual sums. The association, it is said, had $8,000 of its assets invested in an office building, heavily mortgaged. This left only $3,000 for its total cash, it is said. The association was capitalized at $500,000.

Indianapolis.—Indiana Rotary executives selected Michigan City as the place for holding the next Rotary state convention, at their closing session in Indianapolis. The vote stood: Michigan City, 22; West Baden, 11; South Bend, 9. The convention dates were fixed at February 21 and 22, the same as have been observed for several years by Indiana Rotarians.

Logansport.—Anderson was selected for the 1923 reunion of the One Hundred and Sixtieth regiment, Spanish-American war veterans, at the twenty-fourth annual meeting held at Logansport. John Shuffer, Company L, Anderson, was named president of the organization for the coming year. He succeeds Walter J. Behmer of Logansport.

Marion.—The Indiana Farmers Elevator Managers' association will meet at Matter park in this city September 17 and 18. Stockholders, directors, managers and their families will join in a picnic the first day of the meeting. J. W. Shorthill, secretary of the National Grain Dealers' association, will be present.

Hartford City.—Township trustees of Blackford county, meeting here, eliminated township teachers' institutes and instead courses in extension work from the Indiana State Normal school at Terre Haute will be given the teachers. The teachers will be paid for taking the courses and will receive university credit.

Hammond.—Leading independent mill executives in the Calumet region announced that following the United States Steel corporation they would advance the wage scale of common labor 20 per cent, effective September 1. This will affect 20,000 men in East Chicago and mean $7,200,000 to them annually.

South Bend.—Sister Gertrude, who for 30 years has mothered and cared for thousands of children at St. Edward's hall, at the University of Notre Dame, is dead, following an illness of three years. Many of the university students were at one time under her care.

Indianapolis.—Mayor Lew Shank instructed William T. Bailey, assistant city attorney, to prepare an ordinance for submission to the city council, that would require every person living in Indianapolis who drives an automobile or truck to pay a chauffeur's license [illegible]

[illegible] this year. He averaged [illegible] bushels an acre in a field of six acres. He sowed an early variety, which matured three weeks earlier than ordinary oats.

Gary.—Gary is to have a new tenement house costing $80,000. Construction work is expected to start soon.

IMPROVED ROADS

GREAT SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS

Scheme Being Worked Out by Federal and State Authorities to Surpass Other Countries.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A system of highways that will serve the whole country and will be far superior to any other in the world is being mapped out by federal and state engineers. It is estimated that the system will comprise 180,000 miles of road. The federal highway act recently enacted specifically requires that all federal aid be spent on a connected system of highways consisting of not more than 7 per cent of the road mileage in each state, and that this system shall consist of interstate or primary roads and intercounty or secondary roads.

Proposed systems have been received by the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture from all but eight states. They are plotted on a large map of the United States and carefully examined as to co-ordination with the roads of adjacent states and service to all sections of the country. Where co-ordination is not satisfactory conferences are held with all interested state highway officials and routes adjusted.

An Improved Michigan Highway.

Many states have already adjusted difficult problems with their neighbors. As an example the system sent in by Nebraska showed a big gap in an important road along the northern boundary. It was learned, however, that South Dakota would follow with a system that would fit like pictures on toy blocks. Since the federal highway act of last November became a law, only roads certain to be on the system have been approved for construction.

MUCH LOWER BIDS ARE MADE

According to Reports to Bureau of Public Roads Prices Will Be Greatly Reduced.

Early bids for the construction of federal-aid roads indicate that prices during the coming season will be materially lower than last season, according to reports received by the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture. While bids have not been received on any large volume of work, there is, however, enough to indicate a lower level of prices.

Grading has been bid at 20, 23½ and 80 cents a cubic yard in Missouri, Arkansas and Minnesota, respectively, as compared with an average of 35 cents for the section in which these states are located in 1921.

Prices of reinforcing steel in place range around 6 cents as compared with the 1921 price of 8 or 9 cents, and bridge steel at 4¾ cents against 7 to 8 cents.

A few bids, for the best grade of concrete, of about $17 a cubic yard have been received in sections where the 1921 price was about $25 a cubic yard.

Prices bid for the construction of concrete roads per square yard are as follows: Ohio, $1.52; Colorado, $2.27, and Georgia, $1.88, as compared with an average for the whole country during the period 1916-1920 of $2.57 a square yard.

FEDERAL-AID ROAD PROJECTS

Total Mileage Under Construction in May Amounted to Nearly 15,000 Miles.

Federal-aid road projects totaling 663 miles in length were completed and 542 miles went under construction during May, bringing the total [illegible]

PRIDE IN SCHOOLS

Dominant Feeling Among Settlers in Western Canada.

Despite "Newness" of the Country, There Are No Better Institutions of Learning Anywhere.

There is frequently hesitation expressed by those whose minds are almost made up to move to the agricultural lands of Western Canada, that the children will not enjoy the school privileges afforded them in their present surroundings. This is a reasonable doubt. The country is new. It is within the memory of many who will read this that the bison roamed these prairies at will, that there were no railroads, no settlements beyond that of some of the Hudson Bay posts, a few courageous ranchmen and Indians. It was a country of unknown quantity. It is different today, and it has been made different in that short time because of the latent stores of wealth hidden in the land, which has been made to yield bountifully through the daring enterprise of the pioneer and the railways that had the courage to extend their enterprising lines of steel throughout its length and a great portion of its breadth. Villages and hamlets have developed into towns and towns into cities, supported and maintained by those who, coming practically from all parts of the world, and many, yes, thousands, from the neighboring states to the south, have taken up land that cost them but a trifle as compared with what they were able to dispose of the holdings upon which they had been living for years. These people brought with them a method in life that electrified and changed the entire Canadian West. Today things are different, and a trip to Western Canada will show a country new but old. New because changes have been wrought that give to the newcomer the opportunity to become part of a growing and developing country—it gives the chance to say what shall be made of it; old because there has been brought into its life those things that have proven useful in older countries, while there has been eliminated everything that would tend to a backward stage. A writer, dealing with social matters, treats of the schools, and says:

"Everywhere the school follows the plow. Cities which a few years ago were represented by scattered shacks are proud today of their school buildings. The web of education is being spread over the prairie. Lately, however, a new policy has been adopted. Instead of many rural schools, big central schools are being established—each serving an area of fifty square miles or so, and children who live a mile and a half away are conveyed thither in well-warmed motor cars. In the summer, of course, they come on "bikes" or ponies.

"And the young idea is taught to shoot in many directions. The instruction is not limited to the three R's, but nature study and manual crafts are taught, in order that the future agriculturist may have his educational foundation laid. Many rural schools have pleasant gardens attached, with flower and vegetable beds, and the visitor to one such school deep in the country says she will never forget the pride with which a little lad showed her the patch of onions in his plot. Thrift is also taught in the schools by means of the dime bank.

"Following the primary schools there are secondary schools, where training is free. This includes classics, modern languages, science, mathematics, advanced English, and often agricultural, commercial, and technical subjects, and—but this concerns the girls—household economics. For three years this lasts, and then comes matriculation into the university, a matriculation which admits direct to the arts or science degree, or the education may be completed by a course in some special subject at a technical institute."—Advertisement.

FREEDOM FROM LAXATIVES

Discovery by Scientists Has Replaced Them.

Pills and salts give temporary relief from constipation only at the expense of permanent injury, says an eminent medical authority.

Science has found a newer, better way—a means as simple as Nature itself.

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft and moving. But when constipation exists this natural lubricant is not sufficient. Medical authorities have found that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. It is in no sense a medicine. And like pure water it is harmless and pleasant.

Nujol is prescribed by physicians; used in leading hospitals. Get a bottle from your druggist today.—Advertisement.

"Of course I will, Arthur. Why didn't you come and ask me yourself?"

Then Jim shouted back:

Forcloses Mortgage On Farm

Judge Dan Link has entered a judgment for Carl Johnson against Mr. and Mrs. William Burk in the sum of $2,200. Mrs. Burk was formerly the wife of Johnson.

The involved property is a farm of 49.34 acres of land 2 miles east of St. Joe. After the wife secured her divorce she took the farm and gave Mr. Johnson notes to the amount of $2,000 secured by a mortgage. The payments of these notes have been defaulted, and now Judge Link decreed that Johnson is entitled to have the farm to satisfy the judgment.

Mr. and Mrs. Burk now reside in South Bend and her son, Fred Donley, and family, lives on the farm in question. They made no appearance in the case. Mr. Johnson lives near Hicksville, Ohio.

An Apology To Rev. Daily

In an oversight on the part of the editor in writing the article on "Union Services Close," in last week's issue of "The News," Rev. Daily's name was not mentioned in connection with the making of the seats for the outdoor meetings. Rev. Daily's name should not have been omitted by any means because it is a fact that he did more toward these seats than anyone else.

For the first two or three meetings after the seats were first made they were not at all substantial. Rev. Daily then with the help of J. C. Hull reinforced the seats by getting 2 x 4 pieces and nailing them on the sides of the seats. The seats were very satisfactory.

Obituary

John R. Gill, son of John H. and Sarah Gill, was born in Concord township, DeKalb county, Indiana, September 9, 1861.

His entire life has been spent in this comunity where he was always known as an industrious, honest, upright citizen, a good neighbor, and a faithful and devoted husband and father.

For a number of years he had been afflicted with Goitre and died in Fort Wayne at the St. Joseph hospital after undergoing an operaton for that affliction.

He made a hard fight for life but the tide of battle was against him and weary and worn he fell peacefully into the sleep of death on Saturday, September 2, 1922, at the age of 60 years, 11 months, and 23 days.

He was joined in holy wedlock to Jane White on July 30, 1882. To them was born one daughter, Ida Emma, now Mrs. Charles Woodcox.

His faithful wife; his loving daughter; three grandsons, Homer and John Gill and Devere Woodcox; three sisters, Mrs. Emmanuel Ulm, Mrs. J. R. Shilling and Mrs. William Bleeks; one brother, Charles Gill of Auburn, and other relatives and many friends are left to morn their loss at his departure.

Mr. Gill had been a member of the I. O. O. F. lodge of which he was the Noble Grand at the time of his death, for twenty-six years and of the K. of P. lodge for some twelve or thirteen years. He also was a member of the Encampment and Rebecca Degrees.

The life that has been lived in this community, his faithful toil and open frankness, his honesty of purpose and sincerity of heart, or as on open book which is of far more worth than any thing which could be written here and his soul is now before the judgement of all the earth who will do right.

We commend this loved one to the Heavenly Father for his care and comfort.

The funeral services were held from the Methodist church at 1:30 p. m. Tuesday, Rev. J. C. Coons, of Elkhart, officiating. Interment took place in the Riverside cemetery at St. Joe. Funeral director, E. R. Kinsey.

CARD OF THANKS.

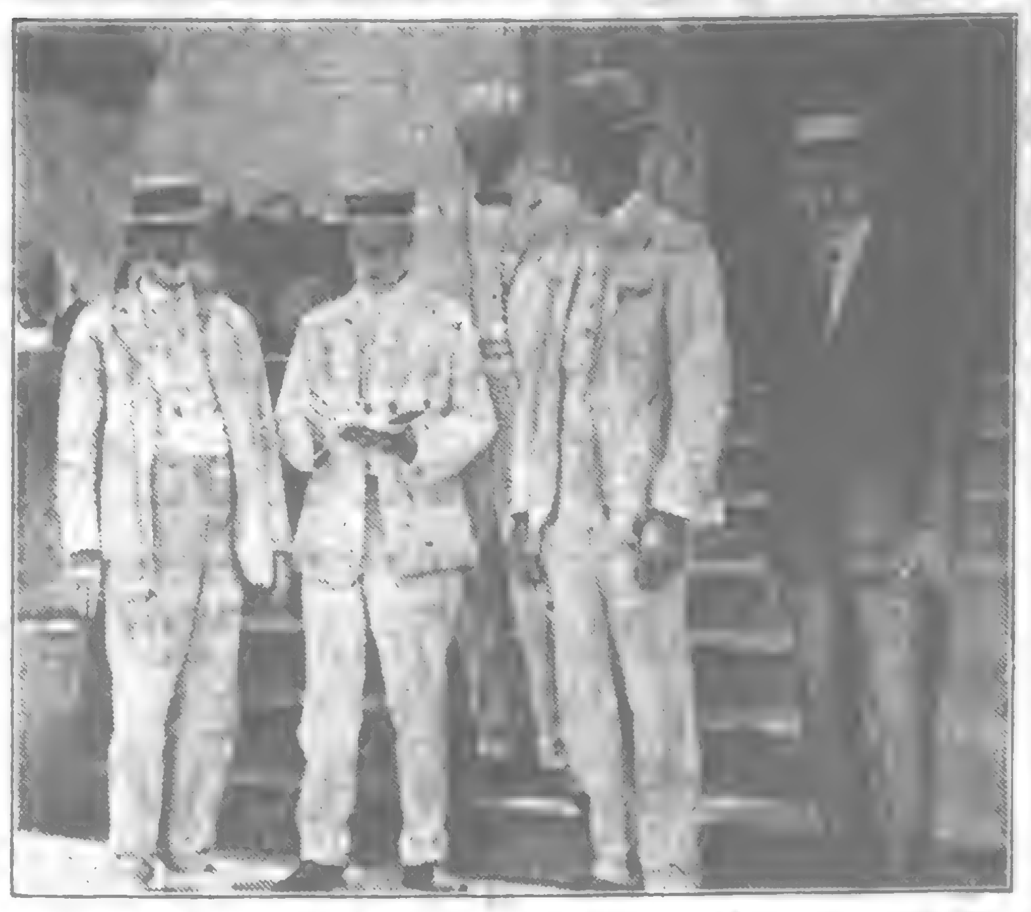
American Farm Bureau



The Farm Bureau has some illustrious personages listed among its members. For instance, here is a picture of Gov. John M. Parker of Louisiana, signing a five-year Farm Bureau membership, as he stands with Farm Bureau solicitors and state executives on the capitol steps of Baton Rouge, La.

ILLINOIS COUNTY IS RICH IN LIMESTONE

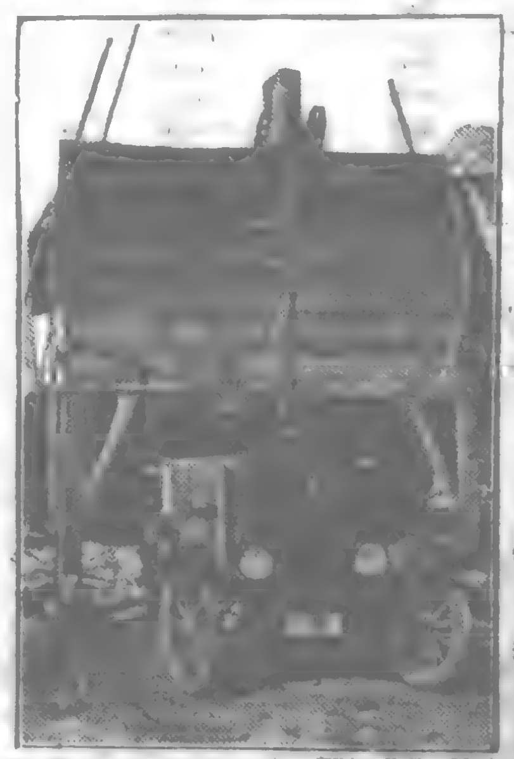
Farm Bureau Members Have Established Co-operative Crusher for Making Fertilizer.

Farm bureau members in Stephenson county, Illinois, have taken advantage of the fact that the county is rich in limestone and have established a co-operative crusher which is turning limestone into fertilizer for the farmers of that county.

Stephenson county is provided by nature with abundant limestone which tests high in lime content, and is found in a disintegrated condition that makes is very easily quarried.

A few farmers of the county got together on the subject and borrowed the necessary money at a local bank and purchased equipment to quarry and crush the rock. The equipment consists of a pulverizer, a tractor, four delivery trucks with a dump bottom, a portable limestone bin mounted on posts and a limestone spreader.

Limestone is sold on a delivered basis of $2.50 per ton, or $2.25 at the quarry, if hauled by the farmer himself. Each farmer who orders limestone gives a note for it, which is used by the company for collateral in securing operating capital. The price now asked for limestone enables the company to pay all operating expenses and will retire the initial investment in two years.



Loading Crushed Limestone.

The operating crew consists of a manager, a truck driver and two helpers who use picks and shovels in the quarry. This crew has been averaging about 20 tons of limestone a day. Moves from one quarry to another take up considerable time. Usually from 200 to 500 tons of limestone are crushed at one stand. Approximately 1,400 tons have been crushed this season and work will continue until late in the fall.

ESTABLISHING TRUE REAL ESTATE VALUES

Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations See Opportunity to Render Service.

In Indiana the value of real estate is established every four years for the purpose of taxation, and 1922 is the year for such appraisements. Realizing the unsettled condition of industrial and agricultural matters, the Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations felt that there was an opportunity to render valuable service to those charged with the responsibility of establishing the values of farm property by co-operating with them in every way possible. This was the conclusion arrived at at a meeting of county presidents held in Indianapolis February 23, 1922, which was called by the action of the board of directors.

The plan as laid by those in attendance at this meeting was to have a special tax committee appointed consisting of one representative from each of the ten farm bureau districts, which committee was to outline a plan of action to be recommended to the board of directors of the Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations. This plan as submitted and approved provided for the selection of a county and township tax committee in addition to the state committee, whose function was to assist the local township assessor and the county assessor and board of review in arriving at the true cash value of all real estate.

In practically every instance the assessers welcome the assistance tendered them and in practically every township the appraisements made by the assessors were made with the assistance of the committee, or were approved by the committees appointed by the county farm bureau. The county committee sat with the county board of review and rendered such service as was possible in that connection.

At the hearings of the state board of tax commissioners when reports were made by the various counties as to the valuations established, members of the state tax committee and officers of the Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations heard the reports presented and the evidence from every angle. Through the work of the organization it is very evident that the estimates made by the officials co-operating with the committees of the farmers' organizations are more accurate and equitable than could have been made by any one individual.

It is also self-evident that with the facts and figures collected by these committees and presented to the taxing officials that they are brought to realize the great extent to which real estate values have declined in the last two years, which of course proves the value to the farmers of the service rendered through the organization. Indications are that after all equalizations have been made the assessed value of real estate will show a decrease of practically 20 to 25 per cent below that of the average when last appraised.

TO FIGHT GOOD ROADS' FOES

National Campaigns Launched Against Ancient Enemies of Motor World —Many Sign Up.

Officials of the newly organized National Motorists' association declared war on a number of ancient enemies of the motor world following an organization meeting at Chicago. They launched national campaigns against political interference with highway building programs, overloaded trucks which are breaking up paved roads, and on increasing motor tax levies, and declared that the campaigns will be carried out consistently in every section of the country.

Their attention was called to the damage done by illegally loaded trucks to roads about Chicago by Senator H. C. Kessinger, who predicted that the new organization will become the champion of 50,000,000 people if its program for improved motor conditions is carried out.

E. E. Ertsman of the Illinois association, and Fred H. Caley of the Ohio State association were named secretaries of the new national body and delegated to open national headquarters shortly in Washington, D. C. An immediate survey has been ordered to determine why gasoline prices should continue at their present peak.

A number of the 350 delegates sent to the initial Chicago convention were empowered by their local clubs to apply for immediate membership in the new national body.

The first to formally sign up was the Ohio State Automobile association, with a membership of 60,000. The Illinois State Automobile association, including 45,000 members outside of Chicago and 16,000 Chicago members of the Illinois Automobile club, was the second unit to make application. Several other units also have applied for immediate membership.

Judge W. J. Meals of Cleveland, Ohio, President of the National Motorists' Association.

NEW IDEA IN ROAD BUILDING

Cement Mixed With Certain Types of Soil to Alter Characteristics Being Tried.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Mixing cement with certain types of soil to alter the characteristics of the soils and make them more suitable for road surfacing and subgrades is an experiment recently conducted by the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, which is now proving its value in actual use. The treatment was first suggested and tried out at the Arlington experimental station of the bureau. Results warranted a field test, and it was arranged with the California state highway department to try it on the adobe soil there.

A part of the federal-aid project in Solano county was selected for the test. The dry soil was well broken up and harrowed to a depth varying from 6 to 12 inches and mixed with cement in the proportions of 1 part cement to 10 parts soil and 1 part cement to 20 parts soil. It was intended to water and roll the surface but rain prevented. One section was allowed to remain untreated for purposes of comparison.

A recent inspection showed that the untreated section was badly broken up, due to the usual shrinkage cracks characteristic of adobe soils. The treatment is not intended to make a hard surface like concrete, but to alter the properties of the soil so that it will be stable and lessen the effects of moisture.

California plans to conduct additional experiments, [illegible] cost data obtained.

BATTLE AGAINST BARBERRY PLANT

Digging Must Be Complete and Thorough in Order Not to Leave Pieces of Roots.

BUSHES DIFFICULT TO KILL

Large Number of Seedlings Sometimes Are Found Growing Under Dead Plants That Were Dug When in Fruitage Stage.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In carrying on the fight against the common barberry, the plant that harbors stem rust of wheat, the United States Department of Agriculture has found that it is very important to do the job of digging thoroughly and to destroy plants having berries, even though they are only partly matured. The bushes are hard to kill, and seeds from plants that were dug August 1 produced a high percentage of seedlings.

The Proper Way to Remove Barberry Bushes Is to Dig Deep Enough to Remove All the Roots.

After the bushes are taken out the tops should be separated from the crown and balls of earth shaken from the roots. Grubbed bushes, lying on the ground, have been found producing green leaves. In such cases one or more roots were in contact with the soil. Some of the grubbed bushes were completely severed from the soil, but there was enough earth left on the roots to hold moisture until secondary roots were formed. This condition happens most frequently in wet weather or in moist woodlands.

Seedlings Under Dead Bushes.

Great numbers of seedlings sometimes are found growing under dead bushes that were dug when in fruit. The last of September berries were collected from bushes dug August 1, and 1,000 of them (about 2,000 seeds) were scattered on loose earth and lightly covered with dirt and leaves. The following June there were 282 seedlings on this area. The same number of berries were collected from standing bushes at the same time and sown under similar conditions. The following June there were 307 seedlings on the area, showing that the immature seeds were almost as viable as the matured ones. It is probable that seeds from bushes grubbed out even before August will grow, and for this reason it is important, says the department, to destroy them.

Advisable to Watch Sprouts.

It also is advisable to watch the sprouts that may come up where old barberry plants have been taken out. These sprouts produce seed much earlier than bushes that grow directly from seeds. Bushes were dug in the fall of 1920. That same fall sprouts were produced, and during the following year they grew vigorously. By 1922 these plants were bearing flowers in abundance. This summer, therefore, special attention must be given to places where bushes were dug in 1920 or earlier, says the department.

WALNUT AND HICKORY TREES HURT BY PEST

Species of Snout-Beetles Attack Immature Fruits.

Methods of Controlling Nut-Infesting Curculios Include Burning Fallen Nuts and Spraying With Arsenate of Lead.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Several species of snout-beetles nearly related to the common plum curculio attack the immature fruits, tender shoots and leaf petioles of walnut and hickory trees. A discussion of four such species, all belonging to the genus Conotrachelus, which closely resemble one another in appearance, habits and seasonal activities, is given in United States Department of Agriculture Bulletin 1066, Curculios That Attack the Young Fruits and Shoots of Walnut and Hickory, by Fred E. Brooks, entomologist.

Special characteristics of the butternut curculio, the black-walnut curculio, the hickory nut, the hickory-shoot curculios are separately described. Methods of controlling nut-infesting curculios include burning the fallen nuts, spraying the leaves which they eat with arsenical poisons, and spraying the nut trees with lead arsenate. While the dropping of curculio-infested walnuts and hickory nuts before the larvae in them mature affords an opportunity for destroying the young insects by collecting and burning or otherwise disposing of the fallen nuts, this method is successful only in cases of isolated trees or plantations. Lead arsenate applications on the stems, leaves and fruit, soon after growth starts in the spring, can be counted on to give good results in reducing injury from butternut and black-walnut curculios. Spraying walnut trees with lead arsenate at a strength of six pounds to fifty gallons of water is an effective method of controlling the butternut curculio.

HENS HAMPER GRASSHOPPERS

Make Better Showing on Infested Nebraska Farm Than Poison—Fowls Bring Profit.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

On the Scottsbluff reclamation project, Mitchell, Nebraska, where the grasshopper pest has been particularly bad this year, various methods of control have been tried out. One of the most successful methods observed so far was used by a farmer who has a quarter-section of land.

Five hundred chickens divided into lots of 100 were kept in colony houses on 80 acres of the farm and moved about as occasion required. As a result, on the half of the farm where the chickens were pastured there were only about 20 per cent as many hoppers as on the other 80 acres. This is a better showing than has been made on most of the fields where poison was distributed.

Chickens on Free Range Devour Many Harmful Insects.

The owner and the renter found the method profitable. After they had used what they needed of the poultry for domestic purposes, and after the weasels and coyotes had taken their toll, the rest were marketed and brought in about 75 per cent of the original investment. This year the owner is stocking the farm with 1,000 chickens as insurance against the grasshopper pest.

PRODUCTION OF YOUNG TREES

Unless Allowed to Overload, They Will Not Be Injured by Rather Early Bearing.

Growers of fruits sometimes are alarmed because very young trees may set rather heavy crops of fruit. Since it is perfectly natural for fruit trees to bear, they will not be injured by early production unless allowed to overload.

As long as a tree makes a normal growth, fruit production will not hurt it. Peach and plum trees may produce considerable fruit at two or three years of age; even when only one year old they sometimes begin bearing.

Under the long system of pruning which is now being so generally practiced there is a tendency for trees to [illegible]

BEN CHACHERRE.

SYNOPSIS.—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season Jachin Fell, wealthy though somewhat mysterious citizen, and Dr. Ansley, are discussing a series of robberies by an individual known as the Midnight Masquer, who, invariably attired as an aviator, has long defied the police. Joseph Maillard, wealthy banker, is giving a ball that night, at which the Masquer has threatened to appear and rob the guests. Fell and Ansley, on their way to the affair, meet a girl dressed as Columbine, seemingly known to Fell, but masked, who accompanies them to the ball. Lucie Ledanois, recently the ward of her uncle, Joseph Maillard, is the Columbine. At the ball, Bob Maillard, son of the banker, again proposes to her and is refused. He offers to buy some of her property. A Franciscan monk interests her. He turns out to be Prince Gramont. In his library Joseph Maillard and a group of his friends are held up and robbed by the Midnight Masquer. Lucie Ledanois, the last of an old family, is in straitened circumstances. Joseph Maillard's handling of her funds has been unfortunate. Fell is an old friend of her parents and deeply interested in the girl. Henry Gramont, really the Prince de Gramont, is enamored of Lucie. Lucie talks with Fell about her affairs and the Masked Masquer. Gramont's chauffeur, Hammond, sergeant in the A. E. F., lives with him. He was the original Midnight Masquer, and Gramont had assumed the role. Where Hammond had been a robber for financial gain, Gramont, of course, is not. He arranges to return the "loot" to those whom he has robbed. Gramont and Hammond put the jewels and money in individual packages to be returned the next day.

In the garage Hammond switched on the lights of the car. By the glow they disposed their burdens in the luggage compartment of the tonneau, which held them neatly. The compartment closed and locked, they returned into the house and dismissed the affair as settled.

Upon the following morning Gramont, who usually breakfasted en pension with his hostess, had barely seated himself at the table when he perceived the figure of Hammond at the rear entrance of the dining room. The chauffeur beckoned him hastily.

"Come out here, cap'n!" Hammond was breathing heavily, and seemed to be in some agitation. "Want to show you somethin'!"

Gramont rose and followed Hammond out to the garage, much to his amazement. The chauffeur halted beside the car and extended him a key, pointing to the luggage compartment.

"Here's the key—you open her!"

"What's the matter, man?"

"The stuff's gone!"

Gramont seized the key and opened the compartment. It proved empty indeed. He stared up into the face of Hammond, who was watching in dogged silence.

"I knew you'd suspect me," broke out the chauffeur, but Gramont interrupted him curtly.

"Don't be a fool; nothing of the sort. Was the garage locked?"

"Yes, and the compartment, too! I came out to look over that cut tire, and thought I'd make sure the stuff was safe—"

"We're up against it, that's all. Someone must have been watching us last night, eh?"

"The guy that trailed you yesterday, most like," agreed Hammond, dourly. "You think they got us, cap'n? What can we do?"

"Do!" Gramont shrugged his shoulders and laughed. "Nothing except to wait and see what happens next! Don't touch that compartment door. I want to examine it later."

Hammond gazed admiringly after him as he crossed the garden. "If you ain't a cool hand, I'm a Dutchman!" he murmured, and followed his master.

CHAPTER VI.

Chacherre.

At ten o'clock that Monday morning Gramont's car approached Canal street, and halted a block distant. Gramont left the car, and turned to speak with Hammond.

"I've made out at least two fingerprints on the luggage compartment," he said, quietly. "Drive around to police headquarters and enter a complaint in my name to a robbery of the compartment; say that the thief got away with some valuable packages I had been about to mail. They'll be in process of transferring [illegible] street, and presently gained the imposing portals of the Exeter National bank. Entering the building, he sent his card to the private office of the president; a moment later he was ushered in, and was closeted with Joseph Maillard.

The interior of the Exeter National reflected the stern personality that ruled it. The bank was dark, old-fashioned, conservative, guarded with much effrontery of iron grills and bars against the evil doer.

The window men greeted their customers with infrequent smiles, with caution and reserve so great that it was positively chilly. Suspicion seemed in the air. The bank's reputation for guarding the sanctity of wealth seemed to rest heavily upon each pair of bowed shoulders.

The business customers of this bank found their affairs handled coldly, efficiently, with an inhuman precision that was admirable. It was good for business, and they liked it. There were no mistakes.

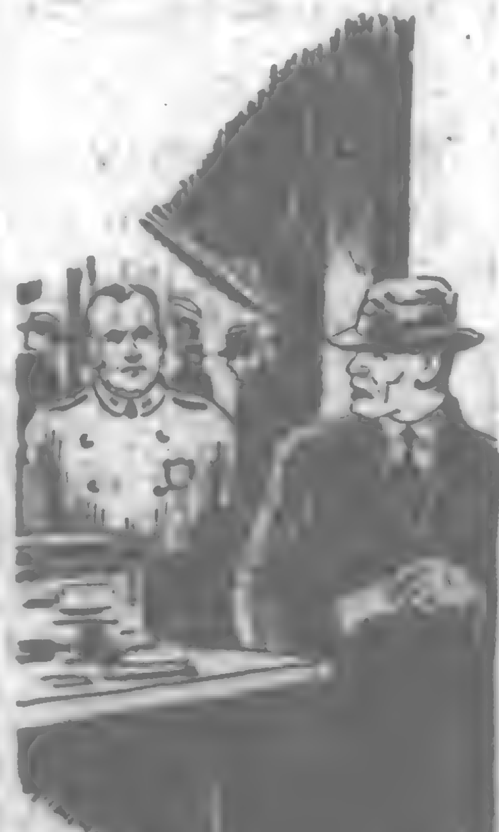
People who were accustomed to dealing with bankers of cordial smile and courteous word, people who liked to walk into a bank and to be met with a personal greeting, did not come here, nor were they wanted here. Chance customers who entered the sacred portals were duly cowed and put in their proper place. Most of them were, that is. Occasionally some intrepid soul appeared who seemed impervious to the gloomy chill, who seemed even to resent it. One of these persons was now standing in the lobby and staring around with a cool impudence which drew unfavorable glances from the clerks.

He was a decently dressed fellow, obviously no customer of this sacrosanct place, obviously a stranger to its interior. Beneath a rakishly cocked soft hat beamed a countenance that bore a look of self-assured impertinent deviltry. After one look at that countenance the assistant cashier crooked a hasty finger at the floor guard, who nodded and walked to the intruder with a polite query.

"Can I help you, sir?"

The intruder turned, favored the guard with a cool stare, then broke into a laugh and a flood of Creole dialect.

"Why, if it isn't old Lacroix from Carencro! And look at the brass buttons—diable! You must own this place, hein?—the cat's tail grows in time, I see! You remember me?"



"Go to the Devil, Then," Snapped Chacherre, and Turned Away.

"Ben Chacherre!" exclaimed the guard, losing his dignity for an instant. "Why—you vaurien, you!"

"So you turn up your sanctified nose at Ben Chacherre, do you?" exclaimed that person jauntily. "A vaurien, am I? Old peacock! Lead me to the man who cashes checks, lackey, brass buttons that you are! Come, obey me, or I'll have you thrown into the street!"

"You—you wish to cash a check? But you are not known here—"

"Bah, insolent one! Monkey in the calabash that you are! Do you not know me?"

"Heaven preserve me! I will not answer for your accursed checks."

"Go to the devil, then," snapped Chacherre, and turned away.

His roving eyes had already found [illegible] argument; say that the check is for a hundred dollars. Then, by heaven, I will argue something with you!"

[illegible]

"You are Ben Chacherre, eh? Does anyone here know you?"

Chacherre exploded in a violent oath. "Dolt that you are, do I have to be known when the check is indorsed under my signature? Who taught you business, monkey?"

"True," answered the teller sulkily. "Yet the amount—"

"Oh, bah!" Chacherre snapped his fingers. "Go and telephone Jachin Fell, you old woman! Go and tell him you do not know his signature—well, who are you looking at? Am I a telephone, then? You are not hired to look but to act! Get about it."

The enraged and scandalized teller beckoned a confrere. Jachin Fell was telephoned. Presumably his response was reassuring, for Chacherre was presently handed a thousand dollars in small bills, as he requested. He insisted upon counting over the money at the window with insolent assiduity, flung a final compliment at the teller, and swaggered across the lobby. He was still standing by the entrance when Henry Gramont left the private office of the president and passed him by without a look.

Toward noon Gramont arrived afoot at his pension. Behind the garage, in the alley, he discovered Hammond busily at work cleaning and polishing the engine of the car.

"Hello!" he exclaimed, cheerily. "What luck?"

"Pretty good, cap'n." Hammond glanced up, then paused.

A stranger was strolling toward them along the alleyway, a jaunty individual who was gayly whistling and who seemed entirely carefree and happy. He appeared to have no interest whatever in them, and Hammond concluded that he was innocuous.

"They got them prints fine, cap'n. What's more, they think they've located the fellow that made 'em."

"Ah, good work!" exclaimed Gramont. "Some criminal?"

Hammond frowned. The stranger had come to a halt a few feet distant, flung them a jerky, careless nod, and was beginning to roll a cigarette. He surveyed the car with a knowing and appreciative eye. Hammond turned his back on the man disdainfully.

"Yep—a sneak thief they'd pinched a couple of years back; didn't know where he was, but the prints seemed to fit him. They'll come up and look things over sometime today, then go after him and land him."

Gramont gave the stranger a glance, but the other was still surveying the car with evident admiration. If he heard their words he gave them no attention.

"Who was the man, then?" asked Gramont.

"A guy with a queer name—Ben Chacherre." Hammond pronounced it as he deemed correct—as the name was spelled. "Only they didn't call him that. Here, I wrote it down."

He fished in his pocket and produced a paper. Gramont glanced at it and laughed.

"Oh, Chacherre!" He gave the name the Creole pronunciation.

"Yep, Sasherry. I expect they'll come any time now—said two bulls would drop in."

"All right." Gramont nodded and turned away, with another glance at the stranger. "I'll not want the car today nor tonight that I know of. I'm not going to the Proteus ball. So your time's your own until tomorrow; make the most of it!"

He disappeared, and Hammond returned to his work. Then he straightened up, for the jaunty stranger was bearing down upon him with evident intent to speak.

"Some car you got there, brother!" Ben Chacherre, who had overheard most of the foregoing conversation, lighted his cigarette and grinned familiarly. "Some car, eh? All she needs is some good tires, a new coat of paint, a good steel chassis, and a new engine—"

"Huh?" snorted Hammond. "Say, you 'bo, who sold you chips in this game? Move along!"

Ben grinned anew and rested himself against a near-by telephone pole.

"Free country, ain't it?" he inquired lazily. "Or have you invested your winnings and bought this here alley?"

Hammond reddened with anger and took a step forward. The next words of Chacherre, however, [illegible] him sharply into self-[illegible]

Hub—But it would be cheaper to move to a new neighborhood, wouldn't it?

But Not Martha.

Katharine and Martha, six and four, respectively, visited a neighbor woman who had no children. After playing with the girls for a time she said: "My, I wish I had two or three girls like you!"

Martha soberly replied: "Mamma might let Katharine come and stay with you, but she wouldn't let me come."

No Escape From It.

"Don't you think fatalism is silly?" she asked. "I can't think there is anything in the theory that what is to be will be."

"There may be something in it," he replied. "I know whenever I take one of the girls from the office to lunch somebody who knows my wife will be there."

What Paul Said.

St. Paul, the apostle and not the city, is only an ordinary mortal in the eyes of Billy, age ten. A group of young boys was assembled in a park on one of the overnight camping trips conducted every week by the Y. M. C. A., relates the Indianapolis News. Before the campfire was put out for the night the Y. secretary conducted devotions as usual, reading the passage in Acts where Paul warned his companions of approaching danger and later said: "Sirs, ye should have hearkened to me," when the storm burst on them.

"Shucks!" said Billy. "Paul's just like the rest of us."

"What do you mean?" asked the leader.

"He said, 'I told you so!'"

How Sherlock Could Tell.

Sherlock and the faithful Watson were strolling down Piccadilly.

"There's a woman in very short skirts just behind us, my dear doctor," murmured the great detective.

"Marvelous!" enthused Watson, after he had corroborated the statement by a glance behind. "How in the world did you ever know without turning your head?"

"Purely elementary, dear old fellow. I merely observed the faces of the people who are walking toward us."—American Legion Weekly.

DeKalb County Voters Must Register

DeKalb county voters must register this fall if they wish to vote in the November election. There will be two registration days, Saturday, September 9th, and Monday, October 9th. The hours will be from 8 a. m. to 9 p. m., and registration will be by precincts.

Voters may register in any one of the following ways:

1.—By appearing in person before the precinct registration board on one of the above mentioned days.

2.—By properly filling out registration blank before registration day, swearing to it before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths and having an official seal, or having it certified to by two voters residing in the registrant's precinct, and placing it in the hands of a voter residing in the registrant's precinct, who must deposit it with the precinct registration board on registration day.

3.—By mail, when proper registration papers have been sworn to before any officer authorised by law to administer oaths and having an official seal, or certified by two voters who reside in the registrant's precinct. If mailed, registration papers should be sent to the precinct registration board, in care of a member of the board, and should reach the board on registration day.

Any absent voter must be properly registered in his voting precinct before he can cast a vote.

An absent elector, under the Indiana law, is any qualified elector of the state of Indiana, having duly registered, when such registration is required, who by reason of illness or the nature of his business or other unavoidable cause, is absent or expects to be absent from the county in which he is a qualified elector on the day of holding any general, special or primary election, or who, because of illness, may be unable to attend the polls.

17th Annual Reunion

The 17th annual reunion of the William Jones family and relatives met in reunion at the Montpelier Ohio Fair Grounds on August 26. It being an ideal day the friends and relatives began to arrive at an early hour. The forenoon hours were spent in hand shaking and renewing acquaintences. At the noon hour the ladies sounded the welcome call, "Dinner is ready," and we sit down to the finest in the land in the way of eats, prepared by the lady members of the reunion and to say it was fine is putting it mild.

After dinner we were called to order by the President, C. A. Jones, to listen to a fine program. After the program we once more filled up on ice cream. Then good-byes were in order. If Divine Providence spares us, we will meet again next year.

YELLOWSTONE'S SEMI-CENTENNIAL MARKS IT AS THE FIRST OF NINETEEN GREAT SCENIC PLAYGROUNDS OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

By JOHN DICKINSON SHERMAN

FIFTY years of National Parks! Yellowstone has been celebrating its semi-centennial this summer. When it was established by act of congress in 1872 it was the first public playground of the people created in all history. Now the United States has nineteen and several other nations have followed our example.

Yellowstone is a land of wonders and its early history is in keeping. Our third president, Thomas Jefferson, bought the Louisiana Purchase—the unknown land between the Mississippi and the Rockies—from Napoleon Bonaparte in 1803. In the spring of 1804 Jefferson started Lewis and Clark westward from St. Louis to see what we had got for $15,000,000. They went to the mouth of the Columbia and returned to St. Louis in 1806, after being given up for lost. Both going and returning they passed a little to the north of the Yellowstone, but heard nothing of it.

John Colter, one of their men, turned back before reaching St. Louis to trap beaver on the headwaters of the Missouri. He discovered the Yellowstone in 1807, returned to St. Louis in 1810 and told about the geysers and other marvels. St. Louis refused to believe and laughed at the Yellowstone as "Colter's Hell." Gen. William Clark, Colter's commander, was apparently the only man to believe; on Clark's official map of the Lewis and Clark expedition you will find traced "Colter's route in 1807."

Jim Bridger, one of Gen. William H. Ashley's lieutenants in the Rocky Mountain Fur company, rediscovered the Yellowstone in 1827. Bridger was as good a mountaineer, plainsman and guide as this country ever saw. But he was a practical joker along the line of monumental lies—he was the inventor of the obsidian cliff, boiling spring, alum creek and echo canyon stories which have been Western classics for nearly a century. So his report of the Yellowstone wonders was set down merely as "another of Jim Bridger's big yarns."

In 1842 and again in 1862 men reported the wonders of the Yellowstone. Nobody would believe them. In 1869 the semi-official Washburn-Langford expedition from Montana succeeded in getting a hearing. But it was not until 1870 that a special federal government expedition established the existence of the Yellowstone.

Thus it took sixty-three years and more than six "discoveries" to put the Yellowstone officially on the map.

Cornelius Hedges—he has deserved well of his country—September 18, 1870, by a camp-fire in the Yellowstone, proposed that the wonderland be made a national park—a public playground set aside for the people's use forever. The idea took. Congress established the Yellowstone National park March 1, 1872.

The United States now has nineteen national parks containing 10,859 square miles or 6,949,760 acres. Chronologically in the order of formation they are as follows:

1832—Hot Springs, Arkansas, 911 acres, originally a reservation, made a national park this year; 46 curative hot springs.

1872—Yellowstone, Wyoming, Montana and Idaho, 3,348 square miles; geysers and other volcanic exhibits, Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone, large lake, great animal preserve.

1890—Sequoia, California, 252 square miles; 12,000 big trees over ten feet in diameter, and some over thirty-five feet and 5,000 years old.

1890—Yosemite, California, 1,125 square miles; Yosemite valley, high waterfalls, three groves of big trees.

1890—General Grant, California, four square miles; big trees.

1899—Mount Rainier, Washington, 324 square miles; Mount Rainier with forty-eight square miles of glaciers.

1902—Crater Lake, Oregon, 249 square miles; lake in crater of extinct volcano, with sides 1,000 feet high.

1903—Wind Cave, South Dakota, seventeen square miles; cavern with many miles of galleries and chambers.

1904—Platt, Oklahoma, 848 acres; medicinal springs.

1904—Sullys Hill, North Dakota, 780 acres; wild animal preserve.

1906—Mesa Verde, Colorado, 77 square miles, prehistoric cliff dwellings.

1910—Glacier, Montana, 1,534 square miles; mountains, lakes and glaciers.

1915—Rocky Mountain, Colorado, 397 square miles, heart of the Rockies, Continental Divide, peaks up to 14,255 feet.

1916—Hawaii, Hawaiian Islands, 118 square miles, three famous volcanoes on two islands, tropical scenery.

1916—Lassen Volcanic, California, 124 square miles; only active volcano in United States proper, other volcanic exhibits.

1917—Mount McKinley, Alaska, 2,200 square miles; highest mountain in North America (20,300 feet), great wild animal preserve; not yet accessible.

1919—Grand Canyon, Arizona, 958 square miles, gorge of the Colorado river.

1919—Lafayette, Maine, 5,000 acres; group of mountains on Isle of Mount Desert.

1919—Zion, Utah, 120 square miles; gorge of the Rio Virgin.

Many volumes could be filled with photographs of first-class scenery in these national parks. The photographs reproduced herewith were selected for these reasons: Yellowstone is the oldest, largest and best known of our national parks. Rocky Mountain is the most popular. Grand Canyon is the greatest natural wonder in the world. Lafayette is the only national park east of the Mississippi. Zion is the newest of our nineteen. The remaining picture, a scene on the way to Rocky Mountain, is typical of the American people at play in the national parks.

The visitors to the national parks in 1921 numbered 1,007,335; the private automobiles numbered 175,825. Rocky Mountain led with 273,737 visitors and 57,488 automobiles. Hot Springs was second with 130,968 visitors. Yosemite was third with with 91,513 visitors and 18,947 cars. Yellowstone had 81,651 visitors and 15,736 cars.

Appropriations in 1921 were $1,081,549 and revenues were $396,928. Eventually the national parks will be practically self-supporting.

The act of 1916 creating the national park service, a bureau of the Interior department, sets forth that the fundamental purpose of the national parks is "to conserve the scenery and the natural and historic objects and the wild life therein and to provide for the enjoyment of the same in such manner and by such means as will leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations."

There will be more national parks. The policy of the national park service, as set forth in 1918 by the late Franklin B. Lane, then secretary of the interior, is that the national parks of the future should be justified by "scenery of supreme and distinctive quality or some natural feature so extraordinary or unique as to be of national interest and importance. The national park system as now constituted, should not be lowered in standard, dignity and prestige by the inclusion of areas which express in less than the highest terms the particular class or kind of exhibit which they represent."

The national park movement is now nationwide. There is an army of enthusiasts. These enthusiasts are preaching that the mission of the national parks is manifold; that general use of them by the people will bring physical, mental, moral and financial benefits.

This national-park transcontinental tourist traffic by private car is getting to be a big thing, with tremendous possibilities in dollars. The Scenic West was literally full of motorists this summer on vacation trips ranging from two weeks to the whole season. All sorts of estimates have been made of what this means financially to the country to have this money spent at home instead of in sightseeing abroad. It is purely guesswork to estimate what the million and more visitors to the national parks this summer paid out in money. An arbitrary minimum estimate of $100 each gives a total of $100,000,000.

The national park enthusiasts have formed an organization of their own—the National Parks association. It was formed by unofficial friends of the national parks to enter a field of the movement which the federal government apparently does not intend to occupy. The present policy of congress—if it has any national park policy—is merely to provide for the protection, maintenance and development of the parks, leaving it to the people to determine the use they shall make of them. The association is an organization of the people themselves to enable them to use effectively these public playgrounds. At present the enjoyment of the American people of its national parks is largely emotional. Among its many other activities the association purposes a campaign of education to double the enjoyment of the people by adding understanding. It says in effect to the American people:

"Our national parks are nature's great laboratories and museums. They are not merely wonders and scenery. They are exhibits on a mighty scale of the processes by which nature has been and is making America. You may double your pleasure in these exhibits by comprehending their meaning through intelligent study. Let us 'See America first!' But let us also know America! Let us know its natural history as well as its national history. Let us differentiate, distinguish and appreciate. Then we shall really know. Then we shall really enjoy."

RADIO

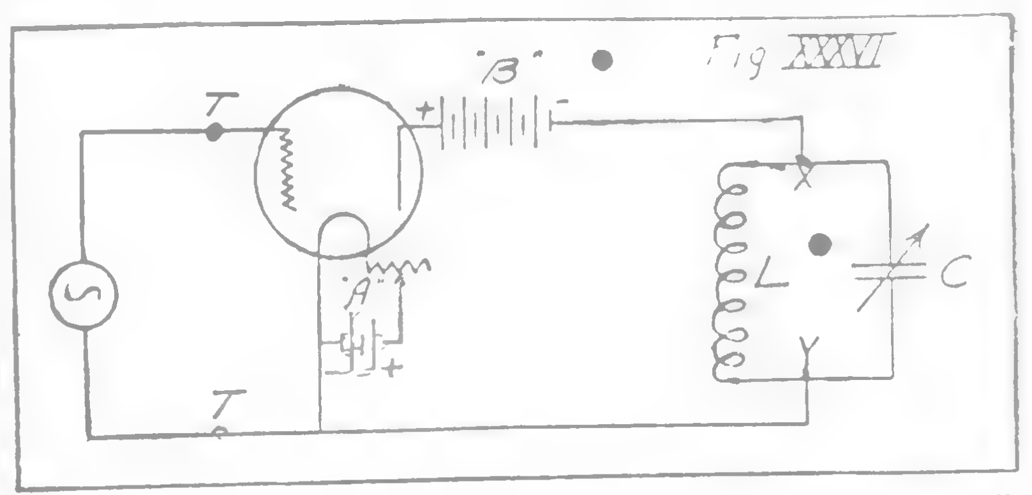
VACUUM TUBE USED AS AN OSCILLATOR

Transforms Direct Current Energy Into Undamped Alternating Current of Any Frequency.

As an oscillator, a three-electrode vacuum tube has the property of transforming the direct current energy supplied to the plate circuit into an undamped alternating current of any desired frequency. By connecting the tube functioning as an oscillator in the proper electrical circuit, alternating currents have been obtained ranging in frequency from one-half cycle per second to 150,000,000 cycles per second. In fact, a vacuum tube used as an oscillator is about the only source of undamped alternating current at radio frequency available for the amateur.

Undamped or continuous wave telegraphy and radio telephony are made possible only by use of the vacuum tubes.

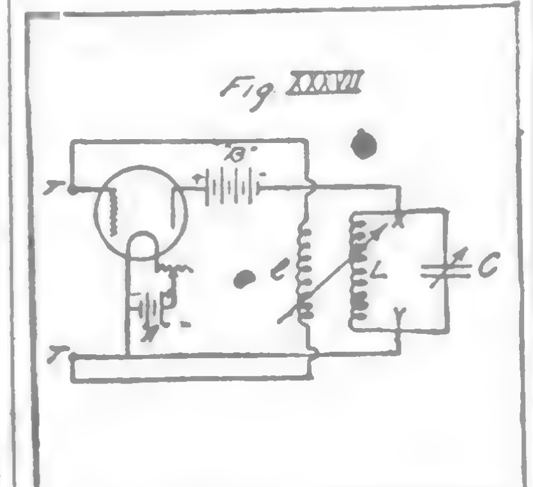
When the three-electrode vacuum tube was functioning as an amplifier it was explained just how operating the grid at a midpoint of the characteristic curve caused the plate current to vary synchronously with the grid potential. Not only did the plate current vary synchronously with the grid potential, but if the plate circuit were tuned the potential variation in the external plate circuit was an amplified reproduction of the change in grid circuit potential.



In Fig. XXXVI is shown a three-electrode vacuum tube with an alternator furnishing an alternating difference of potential to the grid circuit at T-T. The plate circuit of the tube is connected to a circuit containing an inductance L and a capacity C, which together form a tuned circuit, between the points X and Y. By adjusting the value of the variable condenser, C, the natural period of the tuned circuit between X and Y can be made the same as the frequency of the alternator furnishing the alternating grid potential applied to the grid circuit at T-T. When this condition is reached, the tuned circuit between X and Y becomes an infinite impedance in the external plate circuit. The potential variations between X and Y are now maximum and are exact amplified reproductions of the potential variations applied to the grid circuit by the alternator.

When a three-electrode vacuum tube is used as a source of undamped alternating current, it is not excited by an alternator connected to the grid circuit. Instead some of the output of the plate circuit is coupled back to the grid circuit, thus making the tube self-exciting. Fig. XXXVII shows how this is accomplished.

In place of the alternator that was connected across the grid circuit at T-T to externally excite the tube by applying an alternating current to the grid circuit, there is an inductance l. The two coils forming the inductance l and L are placed close together so that the potential variations that exist between X and Y will be transferred from L to the grid circuit through the medium of the coil l, which has replaced the alternator.



Any disturbance in the circuits—electrically—such as the tuning of either the A or B battery will cause a change between the points X and Y. This change will be transferred from the plate circuit to the grid circuit by the magnetic coupling existing between the two coils L and l. The frequency at which the tube will oscillate will depend on the values of L and l, while the amplitude of the oscillator will be determined by the degree of coupling that exists between the two coils L and l.

The grid potential variations impressed across the terminals T-T by the coil l have the same effect in the plate circuit as a potential K (when K is the amplification factor of the tube) times as great applied directly to the plate circuit. When the plate circuit potential variations are just equal to the potential variations in the tuned circuit, between the points X and Y, and both are increasing and decreasing together, that is in phase, the oscillations in the tuned circu[illegible]

There is static when there is snow and rain—and plenty of it when the thunder rolls. As there is usually more lightning in the hot months than in the cold ones, we are likely to have a little more static in warm weather.

"The reduction of static is a process which has its own technique and is as much a part of the game as the meeting of storm conditions is an essential factor in navigation. By making more use of the three-electrode bulb, by tuning receiving instruments more sharply, by employing directional receiving antennae so that the loop is turned toward the point from which the message is coming, static may be, and is, reduced and even eliminated. The amateur knows it thoroughly well, and the dealer knows it. It has merely become the custom to speak in awe-struck tones about this condition as though everybody would be deeply offended, if it were not regarded as something to be dreaded and feared."

TIPS TO RADIOISTS

The Buffalo News says: "By throwing a kiss by wireless a Buffalo girl will christen the new broadcasting apparatus." Who wants to be kissed in the ear?

A Freehold (N. J.) paper suggests that some genius arrange a radio set for the farmer's plow handles, so he may be entertained while covering the many weary miles of furrows.

The radio presents great possibilities in the way of travelless honeymoons. In their little nests the newlyweds can hear the roar of Niagara, the waves beating on the seashore or the clerk in a $10 a day hotel quoting rates.

An appropriation of $68,000 has been asked of the city of Chicago to purchase a further supply of radio apparatus for its police department. Chicago claims to be the first city to apply radio to police purposes, and it has found this crime-detecting utility a great success.

Recognizing the popular demand for radio outfits, plans for the construction of a new apartment house in St. Louis, Mo., call for the installation of a large receiving set on the roof, which will be connected with each turn on a switch and hear radio concerts and programs.

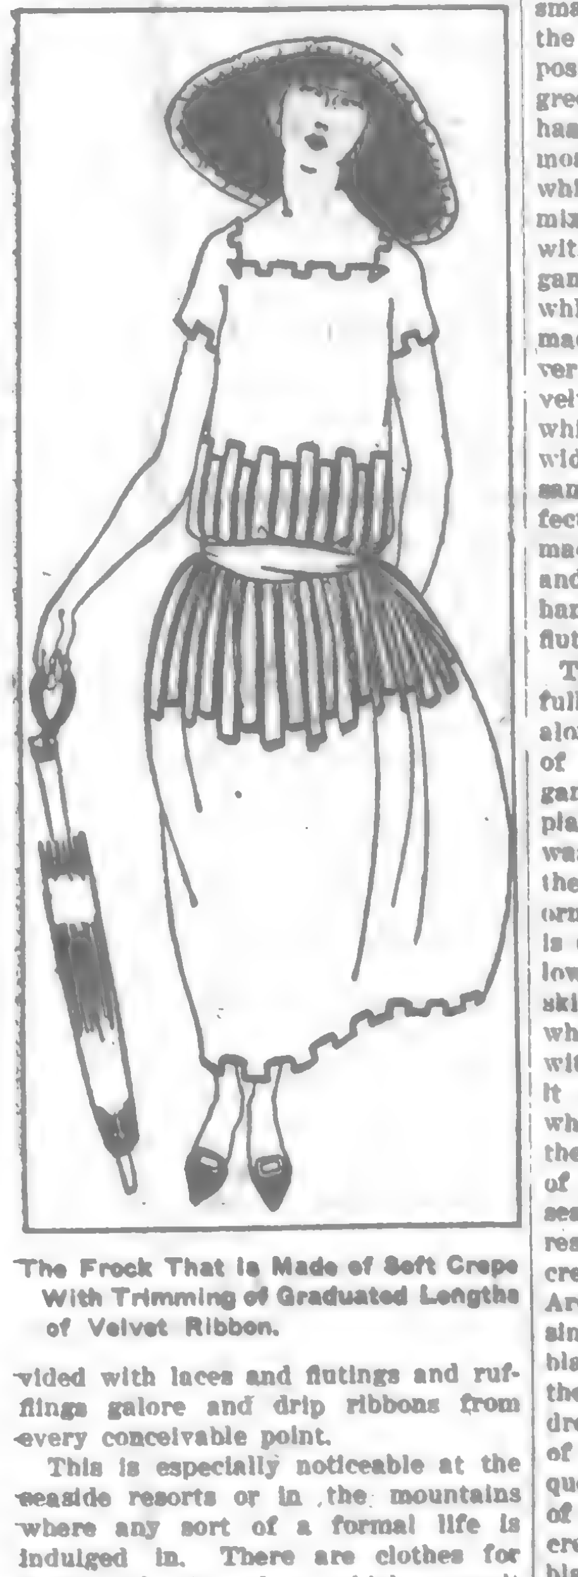
An estimate based on manufacturers' reports show that more than $5,000,000 a week is being spent on radio equipment in the United States. Since the new art became popular in Canada the increase in sales has increased 100 per cent each month since December, the month of April showing an estimated increase of several thousand per cent in sales over December, 1919.

The unemployment problem of engineers and electrical technicians has been solved by the radio boom, according to a report issued by the Federated American Engineering Societies. Since January 1 the society has placed in employment more than 900 engineers, and is continuing its placement at the rate of 30 a day. Electrical and mechanical engineers benefit mostly by the growth of the new industry.

SEPTEMBER

Women's Gowns More Elaborate

When the summer season started we heard a great deal about simplicity, and although we have had our share of that this season, still there has been more elaboration of the late summer costumes than usual, writes a fashion correspondent in the New York Times. This is especially true with regard to the thinner organdies and cotton crepes and voiles, for they are provided with laces and flutings and ruffings galore and drip ribbons from every conceivable point.



The Frock That Is Made of Soft Crepe With Trimming of Graduated Lengths of Velvet Ribbon.

This is especially noticeable at the seaside resorts or in the mountains where any sort of a formal life is indulged in. There are clothes for hours of the day which permit the more knockabout things, but at any kind of function in the afternoon or evening smartly dressed women appear, who regard no law save that which relates to their own adornment. And they seem to have carried out every possible trimming idea with the utmost attention to detail.

Surely there have been artists somewhere to make these clothes, for they reflect the thought of design and dressmaking art which have gone into their making. Being mere breaths of covering as far as their fabrics are concerned, they carry much embroidery and tucking and trimming. The fact is that, although the summer frock looks so simple and plain that it might be blown away by a breath of wind, it involves a great deal of intricate handwork artfully distributed.

Colors, Charming Features.

The colors of the organdies are, perhaps, the most charming features. They have no restrictions, and because of the transparencies of the material are never garish in the least degree. They are simply blooming bits of summer shading, and by reason of the way they catch the light succeed in being about the most sparkling creations of the season. The favorite combination of the organdies or the voiles is to mix one color with another, and the most exquisite things are being done in carrying to the last degree of perfection the combining of colors. Then, there is the practice of setting off a deep color against white, and this, having been done by the French, has been taken up by the American designers to the end that some of the most interesting frocks of the season have been developed along these lines.

In one type of organdie frock the organdie itself is a light blue, and, although there is a wide fichu to make the upper part of the bodice as becoming as possible, there is a skirt provided with an extra fullness upon which is superimposed a series of medallions made up of embroidered organdie interspersed with lace. This embroidery is all done by hand with the utmost care and attention. Only the French can do it, for in this country we are too hurried to give our time to anything so exquisite. These medallions in all possible shapes can be bought by the single item so that they may be inserted in the general make-up of the dress without the slightest trouble. They are already hand embroidered and for sale in some of the exclusive shops, so that if you have the least bit of ingenuity [illegible] you will be able to [illegible] them in a [illegible] of your own [illegible] grace and skill. It has within its limitations all of the elements of the present style. There is the full skirt; there are the hand-embroidered motifs; there is the belt wound around until it looks like a veritable rope; and there is the fichu which gives the dress the style tendency which marks it as a product of the present season.

Any one of these points would be sufficient to make one dress look smart enough to join the procession of the leaders of the season, but this one possesses all of them in a marked degree. Its color is a light blue, which has with it a mixture of green that is most alluring. Then the medallions, which are square, are made up of a mixture of cream-white filet combined with inserted bits of embroidered organdie. As for the belt, one of those which accentuates the waistline, it is made up of a twisting of a wide allover ribbon with a strand of black velvet ribbon. It is a thick twist which makes the waistline look as wide as possible and which, at the same time, provides a decorative effect. It is combined with the dress, made up of a combination of light blue and white with all the subtle bits of hand stitching and embroidery and fluting that it is possible to imagine.

There is another organdie dress with full side panels which are embroidered along their lower edges. This is made of one of those new shades of organdie which have given to yellow a place in the realm of fashion which was never accorded to it before. Now the frock is made all of yellow. The ornamentation around the throat line is done with puffings of the same yellow organdie. The side panels on the skirt are embroidered in a cream white which manages to adapt itself with the general color scheme so that it shall be a distinct part of the whole. The underskirt is shorter than the full side panels, and as this is one of the style characteristics of the season, it is exactly in tune with the rest of the garments that are being created by the foremost designers. Around the waistline there is the simplest possible arrangement of a black velvet ribbon in a narrow width, the only touch of black about a filmy dress which, in all other respects, is of the slightest and most inconsequential of materials. All of the rest of the gown is made of yellow and cream white. And this one hint of black about the waistline serves to give it that touch which is just the note to set off the whole design.

Interesting Silk Dresses.

At the smart places where society gathers in the summer there are plenty of interesting silk dresses seen for afternoon and more formal wear. One of these is made of a combination of coffee-colored crepe de chine with an applique about the waistline of black velvet ribbon cut in strips of differing lengths. About the line of the low-cut neck and sleeves there is a pattern of this black velvet [illegible] which establishes the design as [illegible] that is carried out through [illegible] of the garment.

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

MARY GRAHAM BONNER

THE SHREW'S MATE

Once more the little fairy went to call on the little masked shrew to ask him about himself.

"Last time I saw you," said the fairy, "you told me you could hear so wonderfully and you had a very keen sense of touch, but that you could not see.

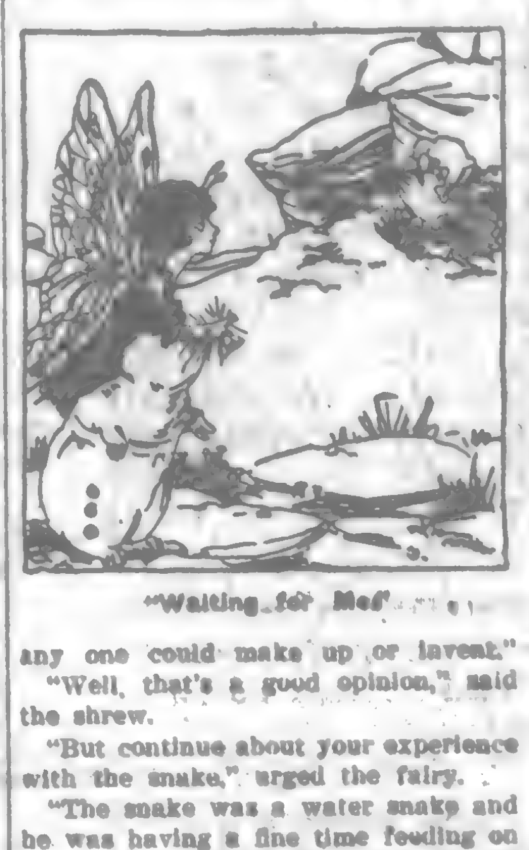
"You also told me how you had to eat as many ounces or as much as your own weight is and that you had to do this every twenty-four hours.

"Then too, you told me that your whiskers helped you. They could feel either side when you were running through tunnels. And you told me of escapes you had had from bigger creatures than you were. Won't you tell me some more? For I think you're such a wonderful little creature."

"I'll tell you some more," said the shrew. "I'll tell you of the time I had with a water snake. This is true. Everything I tell is true, for I don't think there's any sense in not telling the truth about one's self.

"After all I wouldn't want to have the ways of other creatures. I have my own ways and that is enough."

"I think too," said the fairy, "that the true things animals do are so much more wonderful than anything any one could make up or invent."



"Waiting for Me!"

"Well, that's a good opinion," said the shrew.

"But continue about your experience with the snake," urged the fairy.

"The snake was a water snake and he was having a fine time feeding on fishes. Now if he thought he could feed on me he was mistaken. That snake never fed on me. No, Fairy, that snake never fed on me. He may have meant to do so—but he didn't. He threw out some of the horrid smelling stuff which he carries about his snake person but I wouldn't allow that to upset me.

"He tried to grab me, but I got right at him—and though he was bigger and stronger I kept hold of him until all the life had left his body and I was the victor.

"Perhaps you may think I'm cruel, But I have to protect myself. And then I have to eat so much every day. No one brings me my food. I must get it for myself. I must get it by hunting for it too—often, very, very often by fighting for it. I cannot even see what I'm picking out. I must feel it and hear it! Strange way to do the marketing for one's self, isn't it?" asked the shrew.

"Very strange," agreed the fairy. "You are really the most amazing little animal I know. You are so tiny, smaller than any other animal. You have to eat as much as your own weight in every twenty-four hours and blindly you go in search of your food.

"You're so brave, too. You're not afraid of creatures bigger than yourself."

"Were I afraid of creatures bigger than myself," said the shrew, "I would be afraid all the time. I would spend my little life being afraid. But, Fairy, I do hope you will not think I'm rude—"

"No, I don't think you're rude," interrupted the fairy. "Forgive me for interrupting you, but I cannot have you think that I think you're rude.

"No, indeed, you have been so polite to me and you've told me so much about yourself and your interesting ways.

"I would never think you were rude. I couldn't think you were rude."

"No," said the shrew, "I haven't been rude. I have meant to be polite and tell you my ways and I think I have. But I meant to say that I hoped now you would not think I was rude when I started to tell you that I could not talk very long [illegible]

Sunday School Lesson

LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 10

TEACHING THE LAW OF GOD

LESSON TEXT—Neh. 8:1-18.

GOLDEN TEXT—Teach me, O Lord, the way of thy statutes; and I shall keep it unto the end.—Ps. 119:33.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Deut. 6:4-9; Acts 17:1-9, 10-15; Col. 1:9-11.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Joy of Learning God's Word.

JUNIOR TOPIC—How a Whole City Heard God's Word.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Power of the Word of God.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Community Bible Study.

It will be of interest and profit to present this lesson as an ideal Sunday school class:

I. A Model Bible Class (vv. 1-6).

1. The Eager Assembly (v. 1). The people gathered themselves together and "spake unto Ezra to bring the book of the Law." It was not a matter of the teacher urging the class to come together, but the class with yearning hearts requesting the teacher to come with God's Word.

2. The Representative Assembly (v. 2). The class was made up of men, women and children. The men then did not leave the church-going to the women. Neither were the children left at home with nurses or to play on the streets. God's Word should be taught to all classes, men, women and children.

3. An Appreciative Assembly (v. 3). Their ears were attentive from morning to midday. So eager were they to know God's Word that they did not get tired although the lesson lasted for five or six hours. There was no pulling of watches in that class.

4. Due Reverence Shown God's Word (vv. 4, 5). When Ezra opened the Law all the people stood up. This they did out of respect for the holy book. The reason there is not proper reverence for the Bible is that people are not taught to believe it is God's Word. Reverence in the house of God will only be when the Bible is regarded as God's very words.

5. They Joined Heartily in the Prayer (v. 6). As Ezra led them in prayer the people joined heartily in saying "Amen! Amen!" bowing their faces to the ground.

II. A Model Bible Teacher (vv. 7, 8).

1. He Stood Up Where the People Could See Him (v. 5). The position and bearing of the teacher has much to do with the attention and interest of the class.

2. He Read Distinctly (v. 8). Teachers should take particular heed to this. Much Bible reading is greatly to the discredit of the Word and the reader.

3. Caused the People to Understand the Reading (v. 8). The supreme business of the teacher is to make the Word of God so plain that all, old and young, can understand.

III. The Impressions Made (vv. 9-18).

The effect of teaching God's Word is most important. In this case it was very encouraging.

1. Conviction of Sin (v. 9). The Word of God brings conviction of sin (Acts 2:37). It is quick and powerful (Heb. 4:12). The way to get conviction of sin is by teaching the Word of God, not by appealing to the emotions by telling death-bed stories. The people had real cause for sorrow—they were far from God. They not only had become worldly and the rich were in their greed oppressing the poor, but they were perplexed through their mixed marriages.

2. Weeping Turned Into Joy (vv. 10-12). When sins have been perceived and confessed God would not have His children to be sad. Continued mourning will not atone for the sins that are past. It unfits one for present tasks and dishonors a pardoning God. Besides, joy has a salutary effect upon one's entire being.

3. Shared Their Blessings With Others (vv. 10-12). Christianity is not having a good time alone; it is sharing our prosperity with others. True joy manifests itself in giving to others. Pure religion goes out to minister to the poor (Jas. 1:27).

4. The People Obeyed (vv. 13-18). In their acquaintance with the Scriptures they found that the Feast of Tabernacles had been long neglected. As soon as they understood the Scriptures they went forth to do as they had been told. They went to work and kept this sacred feast in a way that it had not been kept since the days of Joshua (v. 17). If the Scriptures were read and made plain many things would be found which have not been observed [illegible]. In the keeping of this feast they dwelt in booths, thus typifying their [illegible] character and recalling to their remembrance the days of their [illegible] journey.

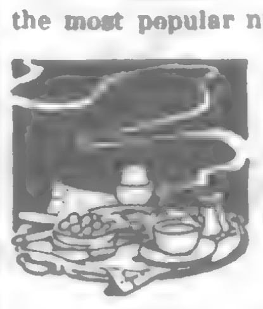
CHESTNUT DISHES

The wholesome chestnut is one of the most popular nuts. Chestnuts contain starch and are more digestible if cooked. They may be roasted or boiled. In either case the shell is scored and when cooked, that and the inner brown skin are easily removed. In sections where the nuts grow one may serve them in numberless ways. When bought in the city markets at twenty-five to thirty cents a pound we do not feel like serving them in place of potatoes as a vegetable.



Chestnut Stuffing.—Shell one quart of large chestnuts, pour over them boiling water and remove the brown skin. Boil in stock until tender, then mash fine; season with salt, pepper one teaspoonful of chopped parsley, moisten with melted butter and a spoonful or two of apple sauce and enough fine cracker crumbs to make of the right consistency.

Mashed Chestnuts.—Shell and blanch good-sized chestnuts, cook in a quart of milk until tender, add two tablespoonfuls of butter, one teaspoonful of sugar and a teaspoonful of salt. Rub through a sieve and serve in a vegetable dish; dot with bits of butter.

Compote of Marroons.—Shell and blanch a pound or more of firm, white chestnuts. Cook until tender in a very little water. Remove the chestnuts and to the water add a cupful of sugar, the grated rind of half a lemon, the juice of two lemons, cook until a heavy sirup is formed, then add the chestnuts and pour boiling hot into a jar and seal. These are delicious as a garnish for various puddings, ices and ice creams.

Italian Chestnuts.—Take two pounds of large chestnuts, shell and blanch. Peel and cut up four red onions, stew them in butter until soft but not brown, add the chestnuts and cook in enough soup stock to keep them from scorching. Season and add four large apples sliced, when the chestnuts are nearly done. Simmer until done; add sugar to taste. This is a very rich flavored dish and well worth trying.

All the air a-shrill with song infinitesimal, soon lost;
Silence only in the forest, to cool shadow consecrate.

A CHAPTER ON CAKES

A cake which is unusual and very good is easily prepared as follows:

Graham Cracker Cake—Cream two tablespoonfuls of butter, add one and one-fourth cupfuls of sugar, one and one-half cupfuls of sour milk, two eggs, 32 graham crackers rolled very fine, a little lemon extract, salt, and one teaspoonful of soda. Mix and bake in layers. Fill with lemon filling.

Rochester Chocolate Cake.—Cream one-fourth of a cupful of butter, add one cupful of sugar gradually; add two squares of melted chocolate, two eggs well beaten, one-half cupful of milk, one and one-third cupfuls of flour mixed and sifted with three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and one-half teaspoonful of salt. Beat well; add one teaspoonful of vanilla and bake in a moderate oven 45 minutes. Cover with:

Ice Cream Frosting.—Boil to a thread two cupfuls of sugar and six tablespoonfuls of water; pour the sirup gradually over two well-beaten egg whites; beat until thick, flavor with vanilla and spread over the cake.

Sponge Cake.—Beat the yolks of six eggs until thick; add one cupful of sugar gradually and continue beating; add one tablespoonful of lemon juice and grated rind of half a lemon and whites of eggs beaten stiff. When the whites are partially mixed put in one cupful of flour and a little salt. Bake one hour in an angel food pan.

Almond Cake.—Cream one-third of a cupful of butter; add one cupful of sugar, one-fourth of a cupful of milk, the yolks of six eggs beaten, and one cupful of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of baking powder. Flavor with the grated rind of one lemon. Beat the whites of the eggs until stiff; [illegible]

F. R. Bowman and family spent Saturday night and Sunday at Cold Springs, Hamilton Lake. Mrs. Mary Bowman and son, Ray, who have spent the summer there, returned home with them.

The Kagey lot on which stood the Widney Opera House that recently burned has been purchased by E. R. Kinsey and F. R. Bowman. Their expressed purpose is to hold the lot until something will be built on it which will credit the town.

Miss Helen DeLong of Corunna, who had been employed to teach in the primary room of the St. Joe schools, resigned Friday. Trustee F. R Bowman was very fortunate in securing Miss Gladys Kain to fill the vacancy thus made, as she has taught here for a number of years and always given perfect satisfaction.

High School Notes

GENERAL:

The St. Joe Schools opened Monday morning, September 4, with an attendance of 194. Of these the High School has 45; the 7th and 8th grades, 35; the 5th and 6th grades 35; the Intermediate room, 42; and the Primary room, 37.

Since there is no adequate room available for basket ball, the boys are arranging for a court on the south side of the school building.

Owing to the intense heat school was dismissed at 2 P. M. each day last week.

Our fifteen Freshmen elected unanimously to take the strictly academic course; this speaks well for the Freshmen. We predict a strong class.

Miss Moore spent the week end at her home near Cromwell.

SPELLING AVERAGES:

Junior	94.69
Senior	88.09
Sophomore	87.25
Freshmen	82.46

FRESHMEN:

High School is fine. We are taking Civics: English; Algebra; and General Science, and enjoy each study very much.

We are not all acquainted with H. S. ways, but we think we shall soon learn how to be dignified High School pupils. We have sixteen members in our class, and are proud to know ours is the largest class in school.

We are all patiently waiting for Initiation. H. K.

SOPHOMORE:

Our advice to the Freshmen is as follows: "Look out for a little red letter."

Last Monday morning when the school bell rang to call us together for another term of school, we proudly realized that we were no longer Freshmen, and with this realization each of us resolved to accomplish more during this, our Sophomore year, than we ever have before.

It seems that each year we have the misfortune of losing a member of our squad. Austin Fellers left us last year, and this year Jessie Engle is missing from our midst. This leaves us only nine in our class.

We are all well pleased with our course of study for this year. We are sorry however to find that none of our work falls under Mr. Grosjean's instruction. Our course is as follows: English, Miss Schmalzrier. General History, Latin and Civics, Mr. Maxwell. H.M.

The next and last registration day will be on October 9. Don't miss the day.

Mrs, William F. Melton died Tuesday morning at six o'clock from complications of diseases, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Fred Hefty, three miles east of Auburn. She is survived by a husband and five children, Mrs. Nina Farrell of Chicago; Mrs. Bertha Hefty of east of Auburn, Mrs Maude Clous, south of Garrett, Mrs. Lillie Wescott of Payne, Ohio, and Frank Melton of Auburn. The Funeral will be held Thursday morning at 10 o'clock at the home of Mrs. Fred Hefty, and burial will be made at Auburn.

Run Over by Wagon

Clarence Hart was very unfortunate last Friday in letting the wheel of a wagon loaded with gravel run over the ankle and calf of his left leg. Mr. Hart was hauling from the Tustison pit, east of town, onto the road north of Clay Coburn's corners. As he was leaving the pit and walking beside the wagon, his foot slipped in the loose sand and was caught by a wheel of the wagon, throwing him down. He stopped his team and had to back the wagon off of his leg. He appeared not to be hurt very badly and continued working the rest of the day. But by Saturday morning his leg was very sore and he was compelled to use crutches.

Marjorie Curie Accepts Position

Miss Marjorie Curie has accepted a position as book-keeper for the St. Joe, the Edgerton, and the Hicksville Telephone Companies, and began her new work Monday by taking the books at the St. Joe office.

Miss Curie was formerly employed by E. A. American Farm Bureau

A Traveling Book Wagon Sent Out From Elkhart (Ind.) Public Library to Carry Books to the Farm Families—It Is One of the Six Such Wheel Libraries in the State.

There are some few things that are denied the farmer's family, simply because he lives out in the country and gets his mail out of a R. F. D. mail box, rather than from a uniformed postman.

One of the most lamentable of these is the public library. And the public library is perhaps one of the things that the boy and girl on the farm need more than anything else.

The public library commission of Indiana is trying to take their libraries into the country and have fitted up six "traveling libraries" which travel through the country with an assortment of books for farm folk.

The first of these wagons was put into operation at Plainfield in 1915. Since that time five others have begun to take the books from the town libraries into the country. Thirteen counties in the state are covered by library systems with stations established in local communities of the county. In all there are 300 of the 1,000 township units served from the town centers. This service covers more than two-thirds of the population of the state and one-third of the purely rural population.

While Indiana has done much to develop the traveling library system and to improve its service it cannot claim credit for being first to get the idea. Rural delivery service from town libraries started in Hagerstown, Md., where the book wagons have been serving Washington county for 20 years.

TOBACCO RAISERS IN FRONT RANKS AGAIN

Co-Operative Marketing of Crop Pays Better Than Any Other Method Tried.

At the close of the first year's activities of the Burley tobacco growers in Kentucky, there is little doubt in the minds of tobacco growers in the state that the co-operative marketing of their crop pays them better than any other method they have ever tried.

This co-operative association has done more than it claimed by actually obtaining prices more than double those of 1921, and by bringing prosperity to 55,000 growers of Burley tobacco, who were worse than bankrupt just a year ago. The splendid record of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Co-operative association and these special achievements have placed the association in the front rank among American co-operative marketing organizations.

The American Farm Bureau federation participated in the attempt of the tobacco growers of the South to organize the marketing of tobacco co-operatively. The Kentucky farm bureau was host to a conference in Louisville on March 29, 1921, at which more than 200 tobacco growers, representing ten states, indorsed the formation of a national co-operative marketing association by federating the existing exchanges. The Burley Tobacco Growers' association is leading in co-ordinating other state and local associations with the national movement.

The Kentucky farmer's fight for good prices for his annual crop of 200,000,000 of Burley tobacco has been one of ups and downs. The 1920 crop brought him the highest price he has ever received for his tobacco, but the 1921 crop which it cost 18 cents a pound to grow, was sold at an average of 14½ cents.

By the first of this year the Burley Tobacco Growers' association had secured a pledge to receive 85 per cent of the crop and 117 warehouses in Ohio, Indiana, West Virginia and Kentucky, for its exclusive use. The war finance corporation and banks in interested districts had pledged almost $6,000,000 in credit.

On January 26, the warehouses were opened for the receipt of the pledged tobacco. It was graded upon delivery by the growers, and a check for an estimated value of 40 per cent of the worth of the crop advanced to the growers. The farmers have signed up for five years.

Blazing the trail for co-operative marketing in West Virginia, the tobacco growers of the counties around Huntington are just now [illegible] under the [illegible] plan, with [illegible] ers' Co-operative [illegible] true, but the association is bigger than money. For the first time, we are able to associate on anything. Tobacco is the first, but other things can follow, and will do so. This is the beginning of an age of association of farmers."

Putnam is the first tobacco-producing county to be organized fully for the campaign work. Other counties are signing contracts of the association, and will be ready soon to stage their own drives. Preliminary educational work has been in progress for two months, in charge of Clifton Rodes. The organization has established an office at Huntington.

Kentucky was the first to perfect and actually market the tobacco under this pooling contract system, but the organization of tobacco growers under similar plans is proceeding at the present time in Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Wisconsin and the Connecticut valley.

These organizations are looking forward to the time when all tobacco growers will be enlisted in similar organizations and to the next step which will be the federation of the organization into a nation of tobacco growers' exchange.

LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 17

THE MESSAGE OF MALACHI

LESSON TEXT—Mal. 3:1-4:3.

GOLDEN TEXT—Return unto me, and I will return unto you, saith the Lord of Hosts.—Mal. 3:7.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—II Kings 17:7-23; Isa. 6; Ezk. 2:1-7; Acts 20-35; II Cor. 8:1-9:15.

PRIMARY TOPIC—God's Promise of the Savior's Coming.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Offerings That Please God.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What We Should Give to God.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—What the Bible Teaches About Giving.

The subject of today's lesson is broader than the text, especially the verses printed. The best way to teach this lesson is to give a survey of the entire book.

Malachi was perhaps contemporary with Nehemiah; probably sustained the same relation to Nehemiah that Haggai and Zechariah did to Zerubbabel. After the completion of the walls of Jerusalem Nehemiah seems to have been called back to the Persian court, but returned to Jerusalem after a few years. Though outwardly the lives of the people were correct, the prophet pointed out the sins of a corrupt priesthood, mixed marriages and a failure to pay tithes.

I. Israel's Base Ingratitude (1:1-5).

God approached them with the tender affirmation "I have loved you." It was the prophet's burden to declare this fact unto them (v. 1). So formal and worldly were the people that they failed to see God's hand upon them. The attitude of Israel to God is shown in the skeptical insinuation "Wherein hast Thou loved us?" The prophet answers this by showing God's choice of Jacob and His passing by Esau; His destruction of Edom and saving Israel.

II. God's Severe Indictment (1:6-2:17).

1. Against the Priests (1:6-2, 9). They were guilty (1) of profanity (1:6). Their profanity was in despising the name of God. To fail to honor God is to be profane. To use His name in any unreal way is to be thus guilty. (2) Sacrilege (vv. 7, 8). Their sacrilegious act was in offering polluted bread and blemished sacrifices. To bring such offerings to an earthly ruler would be a gross insult. Gifts to be acceptable with God must be genuine; must cost something. We should give to God our best. There is no intellect too brilliant to offer in the Lord's service. The young should not esteem their lives wasted who offer them on the altar of missionary sacrifice. (3) Greed (1:10). They were not willing to open the doors of God's house without pay. Our service should be out of a heart of love for God, not for profit. This has a vital application to ministers and evangelists today. To enter Christian service because of worldly gain is of this type. (4) Weariness (1:12,13). Because of lack of love the routine of duty became irksome. (5) Not teaching the law to the people (2:1-9). Those set apart to teach God's law to the people have a great responsibility and God will most surely demand an accounting.

2. Against the People (2:10-17; 3:7-15). (1) For ungodly marriages (2:11, 12). God's purpose in the prohibition of mixed marriages was that He might raise up holy seed (v. 15). The marriage of the believer with the unbeliever today brings confusion into the fold of God and turns aside His purpose. (2) For divorce (2:13-16). Divorce was the source of great sorrow—even the tears of the wronged women covering the altar (v. 13). The offerings of a man who had thus treated his wife would be an abomination to God. The tears of wronged women today are going up to God and make even the prayers of some men an abomination to Him. (3) Public wrongs (3:5, 6). (a) Sorcery—magic. Those who practice such things should be regarded as public offenders. (b) Adultery. This is a sin of wider extent than the parties concerned. (c) False swearing. (d) Oppression of the hireling, widow and fatherless. (e) Turned aside the stranger from his rights. (4) Blasphemy (3:13-15).

III. The Severe Judgments Which Shall Befall the Nation (3:1-5; 4:1-6).

1. By Whom [illegible]. This is done by the Lord. [illegible] has been committed to the Son of God (Acts [illegible]).

2. [illegible]

RADIO

COUPLING CONTROLS THE OSCILLATIONS

How the Vacuum Tube Radio Receiver Can Be Made Regenerative.

If it were not for the bends in the characteristic curve, the three-electrode vacuum tube could not be made to produce oscillations of constant amplitude when self excited. It is easily seen that if the characteristic curve were a straight line, the operation of the tube would be so unstable as to render the tube useless as an oscillation generator. A third condition of relative values of potential variations can exist, that is, when the grid circuit potential variations are less than the potential variations existing in the tuned circuit between the points X and Y. When this condition exists, the oscillations in the tuned circuit cannot be maintained but the decrease in amplitude in the tuned circuit oscillations will reduce the grid excitation, and the tube will finally cease to oscillate.

Thus the coupling that exists between the plate circuit through the tuned circuit inductance L and the grid circuit through the inductance l, control the conditions that will or will not cause the tube to act as a generator of undamped oscillations.

Suppose that the coupling existing between the two coils L and l is such that the tube is generating oscillations. If the coupling be reduced, that is if the coils be moved farther apart it will require greater and greater variations in potential in the coil L to maintain the same variations in the coil l. This weakening of the plate to grid coupling causes stronger oscillations in the plate circuit. The limit is reached when the plate current reaches the saturation point. After this point is reached, further weakening of the coupling cannot increase the plate current variations so that the transfer of energy from the plate to grid circuit now decreases, and any further reduction in coupling will cause such a reduction in excitation that finally the tube will cease to function.

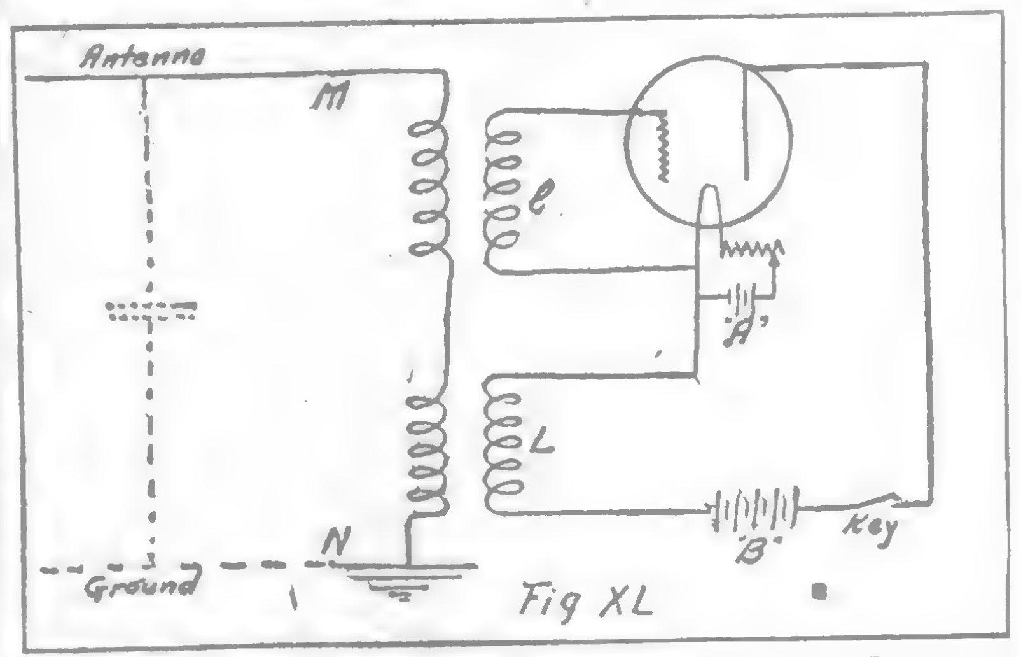

Fig XL

There is, then, a certain degree of coupling at which the tube will start to oscillate, a certain degree of coupling which will produce maximum oscillation in the plate circuit and another degree of coupling at which the tube will cease to oscillate.

From the foregoing short discussion it can be seen that a three electrode vacuum tube can be made to function as a self excited generator of an undamped alternating difference of potential at radio frequency, or by exciting the tube externally by, for example, an incoming radio signal, the amplified plate circuit variations in potential can be fed back into the grid and held to further increase the amplitude of the plate circuit variations. In either magnetic or electstatic coupling.

In Figure XXXVI the tube was made self exciting by coupling an inductance C connected in the grid circuit to L, an inductance in the tune plate circuit. A development of this circuit is shown in Figure XXXIX.

Here the energy, instead of being directly coupled from the plate to the grid circuit, is first necessary to an intermediate circuit, M-N, and then to the grid circuit. It is necessary of course, that the circuit X-Y and M-N have the same natural period, that is to say, they must be tuned to the same frequency. If the frequency is relatively high, the condenser C can be dispensed with, and the capacity of the plate to filament used as a portion of the oscillation plate circuit.

The circuit as shown in Fig. XXXIX is inherently the circuit used in low power undamped or continuous wave radio telegraph transmitters. By substituting in the oscillating circuit M-N the capacity of an antenna with respect to the ground, we have the continuous transmitter shown in Fig. XL.

By placing a key in the "B" or plate battery to turn the plate battery off and on the start and stop, the tube oscillating dots and dashes can be sent out by varying the coupling between the grid and plate coils l and L and the antenna circuit, the transmitter is adjusted for maximum power output. To adjust the wave length the value of the antenna inductance is varied.

SUMMER SLUMP IS BENEFIT

Both Manufacturers and Dealers in Radio Apparatus Are Learning a Needed Lesson.

"The slump in the radio business during the summer months is a boon to the entire industry," declares Joseph D. R. Freed, in an interview published in Radio Merchandising. "Both the radio dealers and the more stable and serious manufacturers are learning a well-needed lesson from this slump," he says. "For example, dealers are beginning only now to realize the truth of the fact that they cannot afford to carry a large and heterogeneous lot of odds and ends in radio apparatus in the hopes that they will be able to dispose of it. They are learning now, by a stern process, that hysterical overstocking of apparatus in an effort to meet the spasmodic demand of radio 'faddists' is not going to prove profitable in the long run. They are beginning to realize that dependable apparatus, bought to meet the varying radio conditions, is more to be relied upon than unknown apparatus that looks good in the catalogue, and is merely an ornament upon the shelves.

"Manufacturers, too, are learning their lesson from this slump. They are realizing that the time of 'order taking' is past and that the time of 'order getting' is here. They are learning now, if they didn't know it before, that in order to sell radio apparatus, they must give good value, serviceable merchandise, attractive prices and real service and dealer co-operation."

AUTUMN IS ALWAYS BEST TIME TO SELECT HENS FOR BREEDING

Pullets That Begin Laying Early in Fall Mature Quickest and Will Make Desirable Additions to Breeding Flock.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The improvident man who sold his heating stove in July because the circus was near and the winter far off differs only in the degree of his shortsightedness from the poultry raiser who waits until spring to select the breeding stock that is to be used to replenish his flock. This important work of picking out the superior birds must be done in the fall to get the best results, says the United States Department of Agriculture, for it is then that the greatest contrast between the profitable birds and the poor ones shows up. Of course the culling out of the poor layers should go on all through the summer and fall, but at last the top-notchers should be selected as foundation for the coming flock, which ought to be better each year.

Never Use Immature Pullets.

One good rule to follow is to keep the pullets out of the breeding flock until they are fully matured. An immature bird may be a good layer and may be from the best stock, but still it is undesirable. Eggs from pullets not yet fully developed will not produce as large or as strong chicks as those from older hens or fully grown pullets. There is no difficulty in knowing when a bird is mature enough to be used as a breeder, as at that time the eggs laid will have reached the size of the average produced by the general run of hens in the flock.

Young pullets always lay a rather small egg, sometimes very small at the start. Those that mature early may be picked out by keeping track of the birds that start laying first in the fall. These birds may be marked with leg bands, so that they will not become mixed during the winter with those that start their work later.

The late molters are the birds that stick to the job longer, and consequently they make up another group that should be used in forming the breeding flock next spring. Leg bands may be used to distinguish these profitable birds, or, better, the early molters may be marketed so that they will no longer have an opportunity to keep down the average egg production of the flock.

The general-purpose breeds, which include the Plymouth Rocks, Rhode Island Reds, and Wyandottes, as a rule are not profitable after the second year. It is therefore advisable to cull out all of the older birds of this class. Of these, the late molters are the ones to select for breeders, just as in the case of fowls of any other breed.

But the selection of birds on the basis of age and time of molting is not all the preparation that need be made for raising the foundation for the new flock. The health and thrift of the fowls must be looked after carefully during the winter. After selecting the breeding birds the poultry house needs close attention. Keeping it in sanitary condition is one of the important points; also the comfort of the house, which is closely connected with the health of the birds.

Fowls are very sensitive to moisture conditions, and these should be controlled carefully by ventilation. When moisture from the fowls gathers on the ceiling and walls there is apt to be trouble soon. In cold weather this moisture may collect in the form of frost, but the heat from the sun in the middle of the day will melt the frost, and the water, dripping down, will make the litter wet. Hens are a good deal like sheep in their sensitiveness to wet feet, either in the house or when outside, and they cannot be kept in good health on damp litter.

A sick hen is a hard proposition to deal with if you expect to get out with a profit on her. It is a lot cheaper to depend on dry litter than on medicines to cure colds and roup. Roup is the sequel of colds, and when it gets into a flock, as one poultryman puts it, you are on the [illegible].

Plenty of fresh air in the house is a well-recognized [illegible] [illegible] the house for a thorough ventilation on sunny days.

The most successful houses, as found by the experiences of hundreds of poultry raisers and by experiments of the Department of Agriculture and State experiment stations, are from 16 to 20 feet deep if the open-front plan is followed. From this point the nearer toward the front the fowls are moved the fewer eggs are produced. In smaller houses the relative proportion of openings in the front of the house must be reduced during the winter months in order to keep the fowls comfortable. Open fronts or openings covered with cotton cloth are most practical in deep houses.

GET DATA FOR FIGHT ON WHEAT STEM RUST

Government Expert in Europe Searching for Information.

Doctor Stakman, Minnesota Pathologist, Visiting Various European Countries, Making Detailed Study of the Disease.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In the hope of finding facts that will be of value in fighting the stem rust of wheat in this country, Dr. C. E. Stakman, agent of the United States Department of Agriculture and pathologist of the Minnesota Agricultural experiment station, is spending the summer in various countries of Europe making detailed studies of the occurrence and severity of the disease, especially with reference to its appearance on barberry bushes. He is also collecting much information on rusts in general.

In France and Spain, where he visited the principal wheat-growing regions, he found no stem rust on wheat, oats, barley or rye. Although there were many barberries, few of them showed any signs of this rust, but in Spain plant pathologists informed him that the common barberry and an indigenous species are responsible for the early appearance of stem rust in the spring.

Doctor Stakman reports great interest in breeding and selection of wheat varieties resistant to this disease and emphasizes particularly the work of several eminent French investigators.

While traveling through France, Spain and Italy he found little stem rust, but this little was always associated with barberry bushes. The consensus of opinion in these countries is that, although stem rust does occur remote from the barberry, it develops later in the crop season and causes very much less damage than in those sections where the shrub is common.

STUDY MANY FARM PROBLEMS

There Are 1,960 Projects Dealing With Agronomy Being Worked Out by Experts.

The state agricultural experiment stations are studying 4,770 specific problems relating to the agricultural industry of the country, according to a compilation of project subjects recently made by the United States Department of Agriculture. Broadly grouped, there are 1,960 projects dealing with agronomy subjects, including field crops, soils and fertilizers, or about one-third of the total; 932 botanical and horticultural problems are under investigation; animal-industry subjects, including dairying and dairy products, comprise about one-eighth of the total, leaving three-eighths of the projects for all other subjects.

Seen and Heard In Indiana

Indianapolis.—The city of Tipton filed a petition with the public service commission asking authority to add a 15 per cent surcharge to the electric service during September, October and November. Tipton owns and operates its electric utilities. In the petition the city said that between January 1 and June 1 of this year it cost $7,242 more to operate the plant than was collected for service. The present high cost of freight, coal, labor and materials makes it impossible to operate without the surcharge, it was alleged. This is the first petition for a surcharge on the basis of the high cost of coal, labor and freight since the acute war-time days.

Lafayette.—A gift to Purdue university was announced at a banquet in honor of Dr. Edward Charles Elliott, the new president of Purdue university, given by the Purdue Alumni association of Indianapolis at Indianapolis. Henry W. Marshall, former acting president of the university, announced that David E. Ross, Purdue, 1893, and George Ade, Purdue, 1887, had presented to the university a 65-acre farm adjoining the campus. The tract is to be developed into a modern athletic field. The topography of the land is such that an ideal stadium can be erected without extraordinary expense. The two alumni recently purchased the land at an expense of $40,000.

Noblesville.—Some freakish prices are being paid at the farm sales being held over central Indiana at the present time. Auctioneers and clerks who have charge of these sales say the only farm products which are in demand now are hogs and cows. Hogs that are classed as feeders are being bought at from 14 to 15 cents a pound, sows are bringing from $50 to $75 each, and the prices of good milk cows range around $100 to $125. At a sale near Noblesville a colt brought $11, and a three-year-old mare and her three-months-old colt were disposed of for only $51.

Indianapolis.—That there is an unlimited market for purebred cattle and sheep from Indiana farms on the ranches of a number of Western states, and that the time is coming when cattle and sheep feeders of the Central West will have to depend on the breeders of their home states for animals needed to be conditioned for the packing houses, is word that George I. Christie of Purdue university brought to the Hoosier breeders at the Indiana state fair.

Indianapolis.—Preparation for the distribution of ballots for the November election has begun at the statehouse. The clerk of the state board of election commissioners is collecting information showing the number of precincts in each county and is trying to arrive at the legal basis for ascertaining the exact number of ballots to be sent to the counties. They are distributed according to the number of voters as shown by previous election experience.

New Albany.—Three young men, John F. Knoob and Edward Trouy of New Albany, and Charles Cavanaugh of Louisville, Ky., were drowned in the Ohio river while swimming at a bathing beach on the Kentucky side of Sand island. Edward Frei of New Albany, another member of the bathing party, was saved by J. B. Foster, who was rowing about in a skiff. An undercurrent was said to be responsible for the triple drowning.

Indianapolis.—Charles W. Zeigler of Attica, chairman of the state highway commission, and John D. Williams, director of the commission, started on a motor tour of the state to inspect roads that may be included in the construction program of the commission in 1923. The highway between Brazil and Linton, about 35 miles long, is one of the roads to be visited, it was said.

Muncie.—The Indiana Steel and Wire company, manufacturers of various grades of wire, the plant of which has been shut down two weeks because of a lack of coal caused by the strike, has resumed operations. The company believes it has arranged for fuel supplies that will enable it to keep the factory operating indefinitely. Four hundred men are employed in the plant.

Washington, D. C.—All bonded spirits of Indiana will be concentrated at Lynchburg, O., under the new order of the bureau of internal revenue concentrating intoxicating liquors in certain designated bonded warehouses. The Ohio-Kentucky Distillery and Warehouse company has been designated for the states of Indiana and Ohio.

Logansport.—For the seventh year the same officers have been reelected by the Cass County Detective association. Those officers are: J. [illegible] Rice, president; F. A. [illegible], vice president; W. B. Ball, [illegible]; James [illegible], secretary; C. B. [illegible] [illegible]

Brazil.—On application in the Clay Circuit court for change of judge, Judge T. W. Hutchison appointed Judge James Hughes of Putnam county. The case is one in which about eighty miners, mostly of Vigo and Vermillion counties, are charged with riot as a result of an attack made on the Jones Brothers' coal mine near Staunton, which operated during the nationwide strike of miners to supply Brazil factories. Nearly all of the defendants appeared and those who failed to appear were represented by attorneys. Harold Henderson, attorney for the miners, had issued a statement asserting that none of the defendants need appear. Judge Hutchinson, hearing this, gave out the statement that those who failed to appear would be arrested for contempt of court. Mr. Henderson then made a public statement at Terre Haute, admitting his error, and the defendants then appeared.

Indianapolis.—The body of Paul Dresser, writer of the Indiana state song, "On the Banks of the Wabash, Far Away," may rest along the stream he loved so well and which to him brought memory of a mother's and sweetheart's love where the moonlight was fair and where candle lights gleamed through the sycamores. Governor McCray said he believes there should be a Dresser state park somewhere along the Wabash and that it should contain a monument to the memory of Dresser, and also that it should be the last resting place of the songster.

Indianapolis.—Corn is badly "fired" in all parts of the state and the late planted crop will be of little use as a grain crop, says George C. Bryant, state agricultural statistician, in his semi-monthly report on Indiana crop conditions to the United States Department of Agriculture. More ground than usual has been prepared for fall seeding, he says in a report on agricultural conditions in Illinois and Michigan.

Indianapolis.—A reward of $1,000, offered several days ago for the arrest or information leading to the apprehension of the persons responsible for the wrecking of the Big Four freight train No. 94 at Clermont, on the Peoria & Eastern division, was increased to $5,000 by E. M. Cotsin, general manager. Announcement of the reward was made by Bert G. Byers, general superintendent.

Indianapolis.—T. N. Taylor, president of the State Federation of Labor, in an address before a Labor day mass meeting at Indianapolis, urged all striking railway shopmen to obey to the letter the injunction obtained in the Federal court at Chicago by Harry M. Daugherty, United States attorney general, prohibiting interference in any way with the operation of railroads.

Wabash.—More than half of the pupils who were graduated from the Wabash high school last June will enter college this year, the principal at the school has announced. The majority of the pupils will enter state colleges, with Purdue university, Indiana university and Wabash college being favored the most. The list of those to enter college from Wabash contains 69 names.

Indianapolis.—The state board of tax commissioners declined to approve the proposal to build a hard surface road through Albany, Delaware county, at a cost of $41,500. It turned down a local bond issue proposal for financing the project after residents had complained because of the proposed addition to taxes in Albany, which were said to be high already.

Indianapolis.—The last day on which a taxpayer may file with a county auditor an appeal to the state board of tax commissioners from any tax levy is September 25, the secretary of the state board has announced. He said the board is urging county auditors to submit appeals to it as soon as possible after they have been received at the county office.

Terre Haute.—The termination of the nation-wide coal strike has not relieved the fuel situation in Terre Haute, and a scarcity of coal still exists, coal dealers say. Few of the dealers are doing any business in this city, and the few who have made the venture say that high prices have gained the upper hand.

Indianapolis.—Taxes amounting to $105,186.48 were collected illegally from citizens of Wayne township, Allen county, living outside the city of Fort Wayne, during the period from 1914 to 1920, according to a report of the state board of accounts filed with Jesse E. Eschbach, chief examiner.

Decatur.—All Sunday schools in Adams county will meet in convention at Linn grove, near Decatur, October 26 and 27. This date was set by the executive committee in a meeting held at Berne. In the meantime, township conventions will be held in each township in the county.

Arford Qualified for Legislature

Charles S. Arford, republican nominee for representative to the state legislature, was born and raised in Stafford township, this county. After leaving the Butler high school he worked for his father on the farm as an employe and tenant until he bought the farm where he now lives. Farming has been his life's occupation. He has served his township as assessor and trustee, served one term as a member of the DeKalb county council, also was superintendent of construction of several public drains and filled many other places of public trust. In his public and private life he has always tried to do what was right between man and man, and he says if elected next November he will do his best to retain and work for such legislation that will be economic and efficient for the people of DeKalb county as well as the state.

Advertising, The Common Salesman

Today the products of America are being marketed by a common salesman, Advertising. Each advertiser pays but a part of this salesman's salary, but no longer can any business man say to himself, "When my competitor deals unfairly with the public, he hurts only himself," for if his competitor misuses advertising, he impairs the standing and the usefulness of advertising—the common salesman for all American business.

Confidence is the basis of all sales. If the customer does not believe what you tell him, certainly no sale is possible, but on the contrary if you could instill twice the amount of confidence in the buying public, your sales would be made in one-half the time.

Markets are in the minds of people, and can be created through truthful advertising. Legitimate business thus can control its own demand and therefore it can be master of its own destinies, in proportion to the degree in which advertising is used legitimately and is believed and acted upon by the public.

The old methods of doing business are gone. They are never coming back. There was a day when each business man could feel sure of certain trade, people had to buy from him or no one. That day has gone. Advertising has given the buyer some independence—it has let him know of other sources of supply and perhaps better. And in this advertising had done a great service to mankind for it has compelled the merchant to wake up and do the right thing. You must keep the home store thrifty and modern if you want to hold the home trade and you must let the home people know what you are doing—Business Chat.

HARDSHIPS OF A DRUGGIST'S LIFE

A housewife was complaining the other day in one of our drug stores of the way in which the rats were overrunning her house.

"You know," she said to her friend, "I don't know what to do. They get into the cupboards and eat everything up before the family gets a chance."

The druggist, seeing a chance to make a sale, suggested, "Why don't you buy some rat biscuit?"

"I won't," snapped the woman, "They can eat what we eat or go hungry."

The Mardi Gras Mystery

"A CARNIVAL JOKE".

SYNOPSIS.—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season, Jachin Fell, wealthy though somewhat mysterious citizen, and Dr. Ansley, are discussing a series of robberies by an individual known as the Midnight Masquer, who, invariably attired as an aviator, has long defied the police. Joseph Maillard, wealthy banker, is giving a ball that night, at which the Masquer has threatened to appear and rob the guests. Fell and Ansley, on their way to the affair, meet a girl dressed as Columbine, seemingly known to Fell, but masked, who accompanies them to the ball. Lucie Ledanois, recently the ward of her uncle, Joseph Maillard, is the Columbine. At the ball, Bob Maillard, son of the banker, again proposes to her and is refused. He offers to buy some of her property. A Franciscan monk interests her. He turns out to be Prince Gramont. In his library Joseph Maillard and a group of his friends are held up and robbed by the Midnight Masquer. Lucie Ledanois, the last of an old family, is in straitened circumstances. Joseph Maillard's handling of her funds has been unfortunate. Fell is an old friend of her parents and deeply interested in the girl. Henry Gramont, really the Prince de Gramont, is enamored of Lucie. Lucie talks with Fell about her affairs and the Masked Masquer. Gramont's chauffeur, Hammond, sergeant in the A. E. F., lives with him. He was the original Midnight Masquer, and Gramont had assumed the role. Where Hammond had been a robber for financial gain, Gramont, of course, is not. He arranges to return the "loot" to those whom he has robbed. Gramont and Hammond put the jewels and money in individual packages to be returned the next day. An explanation is inclosed in each.

Hammond stood staring after the swaggering figure; for once he was speechless. The jaunty words had sent terror thrilling into him. He started impulsively to pursue that impudent accoster—then he checked himself. Had the man guessed something? Had the man known something? Or had those words been only a bit of meaningless impertinence—a chance shaft which had accidentally flown home?

The last conjecture impressed itself on Hammond as being the truth, and his momentary fright died out. He concluded that the incident was not worth mentioning to Gramont, who surely had troubles enough of his own at this juncture.

As for Ben Chacherre, he sauntered from the alley, a careless whistle upon his lips. Once out of Hammond's sight, however, he quickened his pace. Turning into a side street, he directed his step toward that part of the old quarter which, in the days before prohibition, had been given over to low cabarets and dives of various sorts. Coming to one of them, which appeared more dirty and desolate than the rest, Chacherre opened a side door and vanished.

He entered what had once been the Red Cat cabaret. At a table in the half-darkened main room sat two men. One of them, who was the proprietor, jerked his chin in an invitation to join him.

A man famous in the underworld circles, a man whose renown rested on curious feats and facts, this proprietor; few crooks in the country had not heard the name of Memphis Izzy Gumberts. He was a grizzled old bear now, but in times past he had been the head of a far-flung organization which, on each pay day, covered every army post in the country and diverted into its own pockets about two-thirds of Uncle Sam's payroll—a feat still related in criminal circles as the ne plus ultra of success. Those palmy days were gone, but Memphis Izzy, who had never been "mugged" in any gallery, sat in his deserted cabaret and still did not lack for power and influence.

The man at his side was apparently not anxious to linger, for he rose and made his farewells as Chacherre approached.

"We have about eighteen cars left," he said to Gumberts. "Charley the Geog can attend to them, and the place is safe enough. They're up to you. I'm drifting back to Chi."

"[illegible] along," and Gumberts nodded, [illegible] in his eyes. His face was [illegible] heavy-jowled, filled with a keen and [illegible] craft. "It's a cinch that [illegible] state is goin' to [illegible] About them cars from [illegible]" large sealed envelopes, which he pushed across the table.

"There's a rakeoff for week before last," he announced. "Last week will be the big business, judgin' from early reports."

Chacherre pocketed the envelopes, lighted a cigarette, and leaned forward.

"Say, Izzy! You got to send a new man down to the Bayou Latouche right away. Lafarge was there, you know; a nigger shot him yesterday. The nigger threatened to squeal unless he got his money back—Lafarge was a fool and didn't know how to handle him. The boss says to shoot a new man down there. Also, he says, you'd better watch out about spreadin' the lottery into Texas and Alabama, account of the government rules."

The heavy features of Gumberts closed in a scowl.

"You tell your boss," he said, "that when it comes to steerin' clear of federal men, I don't want no instructions from nobody! We got every man in this state spotted. Every one that can be fixed is fixed—and that goes for the legislators and politicians clean up the line! Tell your boss to handle the local gov'ment as well as I handle other things, and he'll do all that's necessary. What he'd ought to attend to, for one thing, is this here guy who calls himself the Midnight Masquer. I've told him before that this guy was playing h—l with my system! This Masquer gets no protection, see? The quicker Fell goes after him the better for all concerned—"

Chacherre laughed, not without a swagger.

"We've attended to all that, Izzy—we've dropped on him and settled We've Attended to All That Izzy—We've Dropped on Him and Settled Him!"

him! The guy was doin' it for a carnival joke, that's all. His loot is all goin' back to the owners today. It needn't worry you, anyhow! There was nothin' much to it—jewelry that couldn't be disposed of, for the most part. We couldn't take chances on that sort o' junk."

"I should say not." Gumberts regarded him with a scowl. "You've got the stuff?"

"The boss has. Look here, Izzy, I want you to use a little influence with headquarters on this deal—the boss doesn't want to show his hand there," and leaning forward, Ben Chacherre spoke in a low tone. Then, Gumberts heard him out, chuckled, and nodded assent.

At two that afternoon Henry Gramont was summoned to the telephone. He was greeted by a voice which he did not recognize, but which announced itself promptly.

"This is Mr. Gramont? Police headquarters speakin'. You laid a charge this morning against a fellow named Chacherre?"

"Yes," answered Gramont.

"Must ha' been some mistake, then," came the response. "We thought the papers fitted, but found later they [illegible]. We looked up the Chacherre [illegible] found he was workin' steady [illegible] O. K. What's more to [illegible] he proved up a dead sure [illegible]"

"[illegible]" said Gramont. "Then there's nothing to be done?"

"Not yet. We're workin' on it, and maybe we'll have some news [illegible]"

[illegible]

Twelfth Night Revelers soon after Christmas, and is closed by that of the Krewe of Comus on Mardi Gras night. Upon this evening of "Fat Tuesday," indeed, both Rex and Comus hold forth. Rex is the popular ball, the affair of the people, and is held in the Athenaeum. From here, about midnight, the king and queen proceed to Comus ball.

Comus is an assembly of such rigid exclusiveness that even the tickets to the gallery are considered social prizes. The personae of the Krewe, on this particular year, as in all previous ones, would remain unknown; there is no unmasking at Comus. This institution, a tremendous social power and potentially a financial power also, during decades of the city's life, is held absolutely above any taint of favoritism or commercialism. Even the families of those concerned might not always be certain whether their sons and brothers belonged to the Krewe of Comus.

Henry Gramont did not attend the ball of Proteus on Monday night. Instead, he sat in his own room, while through the streets of the French quarter outside was raging the carnival at its height. Before him were maps and reports upon the gas and oil fields about Bayou Terrebonne—fields where great domes of natural gas were already located and in use, and where oil was being found in some quantity. Early on Wednesday morning Gramont intended to set forth to his work. He had been engaged to make a report to Bob Maillard's company, and he would make it. Then he would resign his advisory job, and be free. A smile curled his lips as he thought of young Maillard and the company.

"The young gentleman will be sadly surprised to discover that I've gotten out from under—and that his respected father holds my stock!" he reflected. "That was a good deal; I lost a thousand to old Maillard in order to have the balance of thirty thousand!"

A knock at his door interrupted the thread of his thought. Gramont opened, to find the concierge with a note which had been left at the door below by a masked Harlequin, who had then disappeared without awaiting any reply.

Gramont recognized the writing on the envelope, and hastened to the note inside. His face changed, however, as he read it:

"Please call promptly at eleven tomorrow morning. I wish to see you upon a matter of business.

"LUCIE LEDANOIS."

Gramont gazed long at this note, his brows drawn down into a harsh line. It was not like Lucie in its tone, somehow; he sensed something amiss, something vaguely but mostly decidedly out of tune. "Eleven tomorrow morning, eh?" he murmured. "That's queer, too, for she's to be at the Proteus ball tonight. Most girls would not be conducting business affairs at eleven in the morning, after being up all night at Proteus! It must be something important. Besides, she's not in a class with anyone else. She's a rare girl; no nonsense in her—full of a deep, strong sense of things—"

He forced himself from thoughts of Lucie, forced himself from her personality, and returned to his reports with an effort of concentration.

When Gramont went to bed that night it was with a startling and audacious scheme well defined in his brain; a scheme whose first conception seemed ludicrous and impossible, yet which, on second consideration, appeared in a very different light. It deserved serious thought—and Gramont had made his decision before he went to sleep.

The following day was Tuesday—Mardi Gras, Shrove Tuesday, the last day before Lent began, and the final culminating day of carnival. Henry Gramont, however, was destined to find little in its beginning of much personal pleasure.

At eleven in the morning Hammond drove him to the Ledanois home, where Gramont was admitted by one of the colored servants and shown into the parlor. A moment later Lucie herself appeared. At first glance her smiling greeting [illegible] the half-sensed apprehensions of Gramont. Almost [illegible], however, he noted a [illegible] change in her manner [illegible]

GOOD HIGHWAYS

TO REGULATE ROAD TRAFFIC

Highways Authorities Must Be Given Wide Discretion as Conditions Vary Greatly.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Regulation of the character and weight of highway traffic to prevent undue injury to the highway is an administrative matter and cannot be properly taken care of by detailed and arbitrary legislation. This is the conclusion of the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture, based on experiments to determine the effect of all kinds of traffic on road surfaces and observations on conditions throughout the United States.

Even in a single state conditions vary to such an extent that a load which may be carried on one road without injury may cause untold damage to another. Under the average regulatory law thus far made effective, the greatest service has not been secured from the best roads, nor the safety of the lesser capacity roadways assured. The influence of subgrade soils, tire equipment, distribution of load to the wheels, speed, and many other variables is too complex to be written into law.

Main Highway in Indiana Community.

The seasonal variation alone in the carrying capacity of the roadbeds, due to moisture conditions, is one of the most serious of all the causes of road damage. Highway authorities therefore must be given wide discretion in traffic regulation. The bureau urges that as a solution of the problem the state highway officials of each state be given broad powers, so that traffic can be regulated to suit conditions as they exist at any particular time.

ORGANIC MATTER IN SANDS

Material Unsuitable for Concrete to Be Investigated by Bureau of Public Roads.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Sands unsuitable for concrete on account of the presence of loam or other organic matter are to be investigated by the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture and methods of treatment devised to make them safe for use.

Until recent years it often happened that concrete made of good cement and well-graded and apparently good sand, would disintegrate and become worthless. In such cases the poor quality has been attributed to all the different things which go to make a poor concrete.

A few years ago laboratory workers discovered the effect of organic matter in sand and devised a simple test to determine its presence in harmful quantities. The bureau now hopes to find methods of treatment so that such sands can be used. Samples of sand from all parts of the country are desired and anyone is invited to send in a sample in which the presence of organic matter is suspected, addressed to the Bureau of Public Roads, Washington, D. C.

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

DEXTER

There was nothing in the world Dexter loved so much as the circus.

He had always loved the circus. He wasn't perfectly sure, but he thought that he remembered that when he was a baby he had said:

"Goo, Goo," in a particularly cheerful tone of voice when he had heard the family saying that the circus would soon be coming to town.

And he had never stopped loving it. There was always something so thrilling about it.

He loved to hear the men call out:

"Hurry to the big tent, ladies and gentlemen! The big show is about to commence. This way, ladies and gentlemen!"

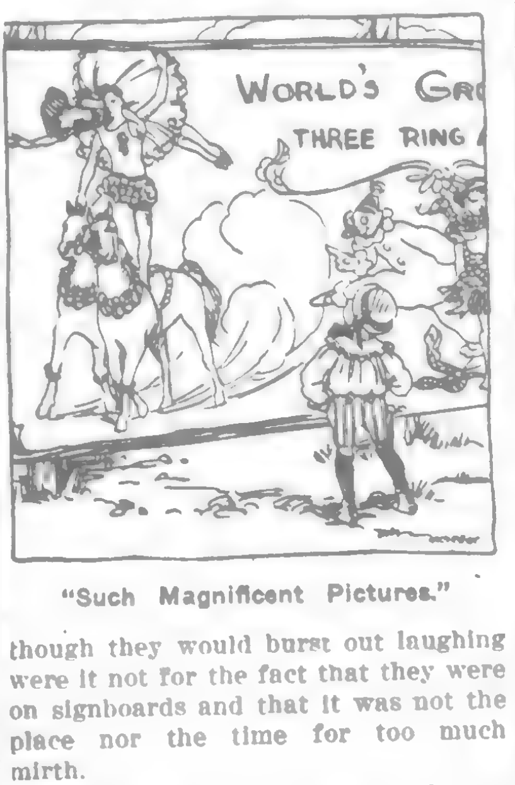
Oh, it was exciting from the very start.

In the first place of all it was wonderful to see the posters go up all about the town. It was so nice to realize that the circus soon would be coming.

The posters had such magnificent pictures upon them.

There were fine ladies and handsome gentlemen riding beautiful horses and there were pictures of droll, funny clowns with such jolly queer faces!

And then there were pictures of wild animals, only in the pictures the animals looked very far from being wild. They looked amused and as though they would burst out laughing were it not for the fact that they were on signboards and that it was not the place nor the time for too much mirth.



"Such Magnificent Pictures."

Then there were pictures of men and ladies on swings and ropes doing all sorts of wonderful stunts high in the air.

And there was a picture of a fine old rhinoceros fellow and of a hippopotamus and of some bears and of some performing seals.

Oh, the posters were certainly very fine.

And then, not long after the posters were up, the circus was due to arrive.

It would always arrive early, early in the morning, but not too early for Dexter.

In fact it was surprising how easy it was to get up the morning the circus was due.

It was just as though sleep knew it had no business around boys on circus morning!

Dexter would go up to the train with many of his friends and they'd watch the circus people unloading and they'd help, too.

Then down to the fair grounds they'd go where the tents would be put up. There would be the big tent for the big show and the tents for the side show and for the animals.

There was also a tent where the circus people were going to eat their dinner and supper and another where they would dress in their circus finery.

In the morning there was a circus parade, and how splendid it always was!

For some time it seemed as though it would never get started and people down in the town would get very nervous for fear that perhaps there had been so long a delay that there would not be a parade.

But always the parade would come along and all the worries would be forgotten at the first sound of the band and the sight of the gorgeousness of the circus people and the circus animals.

In the afternoon the show would be the thing. In the evening there would be another show and usually Dexter could persuade an uncle or a cousin to take him to the evening show.

Dexter knew how others loved the circus and how many of them took [illegible] as an excuse to see it themselves!

But Dexter didn't mind, as long as he was taken a [illegible] time, what [illegible] excuse [illegible]

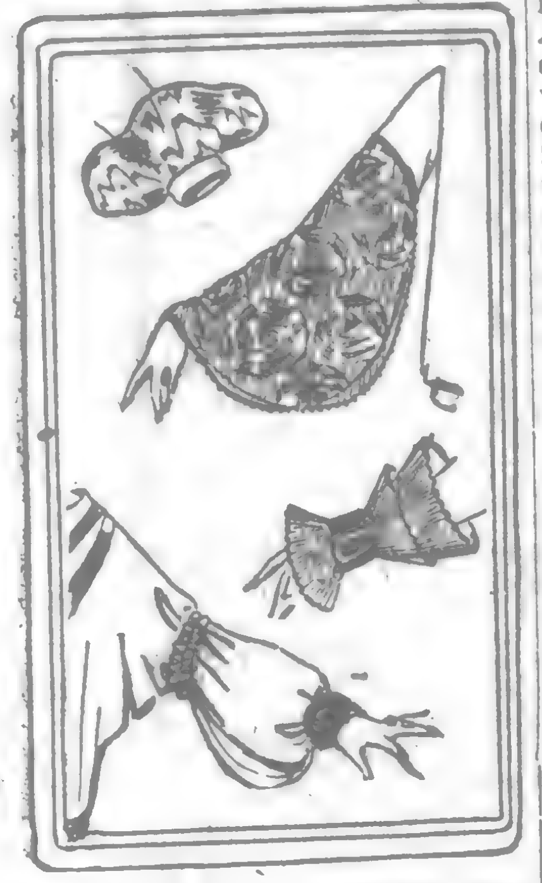
Gaudy Sleeves in New Styles

One of the first notes from the Paris opening says: "No great change is shown, except that sleeves are more gorgeous than ever and more varied."

Well, that is just as we would have it, asserts a fashion writer in the New York Times.

We have grown accustomed to petting and pampering our sleeves as though they were the favorite twins of the family. We know now that unless we pay special attention to that portion of our costume we are lost as far as style is concerned. And we have realized the fact that beautiful sleeves can make a gown as no other detail can.



Sleeve of Lace Cut in Circular Piece (Top), Having Turned-Back Cuff of White Moire. Below: White Puffed Chiffon, Fur Cuff and Cuff of Plaited Organdie, Black Velvet Wristband.

A trifle of experimentation will show that the design of one's sleeves can be carried into the line of the gown in such a way that the sleeves become and remain the actual center of attraction and style. And now that we have the sanction of Paris for going ahead with our sleeve achievements, we should manage to do some extraordinarily lovely things during the coming season. We have spent a season in experimentation, as it were, and now, after our months of education, we are launched upon a career of actual artistic accomplishment.

The style declaration that there is no trimming can be accepted and believed until we consider the sleeves of the day. For all the decoration that once was spread over a far broader surface has now been concentrated within the area of the sleeve. We find there not a mere suggestion of trimming, but an actual mass of it. The fact is that often the sleeve is nothing but trimming, and so greedy is it of the place it has come to hold that it succeeds in preventing decoration in any other place. We find embroidered sleeves, brocaded sleeves, latticeworked sleeves, puffed sleeves, plain sleeves. In fact, there is no end to the surprises that are sprung upon us at every turn of fashion's way.

Now there are certain questions about sleeves which might as well be settled at once. First, sleeves will be long. They will still be full, though not quite so extraordinarily so as they have been. Some of them will be fitted, even from the elbow to the wrist. In evening dresses there will still be only suggestions of sleeves or indications that sleeves might be there in that particular space if the thing had so happened. For coats and capes there will be those voluminous crosses between sleeves and capes which make the wraps look as spacious and comfortable as can be. All of these things will be so, and then there will be so many exceptions that the rules will seem utterly superfluous.

Some of the Newer Sleeves.

A study of some of the newer sleeves is a good approach to the fall costumes, for, as has been said, they will set the pace. And if one's foundation fashion knowledge has much to do with sleeves, then the path to general smartness of attire will be a simple one indeed.

Among three interesting types of sleeves one is made of strips of beautifully brocaded ribbon. The design is Egyptian, and the colors are the [illegible] gorgeous dull ones that [illegible] the period. The color of the gown [illegible] blue and the material is [illegible] soft and pliable silk [illegible] fashionable just now. [illegible] with the dark yellow, green, [illegible] golden [illegible] is applied in long [illegible] on the [illegible] and the sleeve is [illegible] silk is [illegible] and transparent sleeve. Another one has made a cap over the top of the arm, or, rather, the shoulder, and has used for this a two-inch woven ribbon placed in a series of strips. Still another sleeve of ribbon—this for a more dressy sort of frock—has strips of picot-edged ribbon in a narrow width, extending from the elbow away into the world in careless lengths. Ingenuity goes a long way in the using of ribbon for the beautifying of sleeves. And it is possible for anyone to design a dress that will make use of some valued bit of ribbon to the glorification of the whole gown. These old-fashioned ideas are coming into general usage again, especially with relation to sleeves, for with the evident necessity for making the sleeve a picturesque quantity, all sorts of modes and manners must be employed in order to lift the modern sleeve out of the class of the usual.

Ruffles of Soft Chiffon.

Another sleeve is made of a series of ruffles of soft chiffon. It is a youthful sleeve and one that, doubtless, will find great favor among the younger girls still wanting to look their fluffiest selves. At any rate, it is a sleeve that any mother will love to design for her daughter's party frock. It carries with it so much of charm and grace. And it is evident that, with a sleeve of this fluffy character, not a great deal in the way of other trimming is needed. There might be a few ruffles to match on the skirt, but a more attractive idea would be to keep the frock very straight and plain and full, with the low hanging bertha, and the girdle of brightly colored ribbon roses. Then let the ruffles on the sleeves in their graduated widths count for everything all by themselves. They will be much more effective that way and will have a chance, without interruption of design, to display the really lovely lines which they establish for the whole costume.

An interesting sleeve finish is suggested for a dinner dress. The dress itself is one of those draped affairs with the lines of the fabric made gracefully to follow those of the figure itself. Then a shaped piece of silver and gold brocade is arranged for a low-cut collar and over the arm is hung a strip of the same trimming to make the armhole decoration. By this little trick, that sometimes ugly line of the sleeveless gown is done away with altogether and the arm is still left to shine in uninterrupted splendor. There are any number of adaptations of this idea to be seen on the newer gowns, and while the combination of black satin with sparkling silver trimming is one that has found much favor, there are other color combinations which can be worked out most successfully in this way.

Among the Handsomer Gowns.

White organdie and cream batiste, combined with lace, have suddenly become very popular among the handsomer gowns for late summer wear. This may be an indication, too, that a style of this sort will carry over into winter. But on the street and in all the smart lunching places these days one is very apt to see a black crepe or

VARIETY FOR YOUR TABLE

The greatest help in avoiding monotony in menus is the weekly planning ahead of the meals. An occasional meal may be left blank and filled in with such leftovers as are found available.

The kind of food we serve depends upon the kind of people we are to serve. A child needs plain, wholesome food, as do hungry men. When one has a heavy main dish, a light dessert should follow, and when serving a light main dish, a hearty dessert.

Fats in meats need acid fruits and tart flavors to cut them and make them both appetizing and digestible.

During the heated term the meat dishes should be cut down. Nitrogenous foods have a process of putrefaction which is peculiar to that food. By this decomposition by-products are formed, which are more or less poisonous. Vegetable foods may ferment and cause irritation, but with animal foods, as well as the protein vegetable foods like peas and beans, these poisons often cause autointoxication. The vast majority who suffer in this way are overeaters. Going without a meal once or twice a week, or fasting a day, would improve the health of two-thirds of the overfat and self-indulgent. The individual who cannot say "no" to his appetite, "for his stomach's sake," will not stand very firm on higher demands.

In dishes requiring milk, the overfed should use skim milk. This will make a very acceptable soup; rice and tapioca may be cooked in skim milk; chicken and ham, which is such a favorite dish baked in milk. The skim milk may be used, at much less expense.

Veal en Casserole.—Cut the veal in serving-sized pieces, roll in seasoned flour and brown in a little fat. Have the casserole hot, add the meat with a chopped green pepper and one small onion, also chopped. Add a little hot water, cover and cook slowly for three hours. Add seasonings when the dish is half-cooked. An old fowl, squirrel or rabbit may be made into a most tasty dish by this long slow-cooking.

"Forenoon and afternoon and night, forenoon and afternoon and night and what
The empty song repeats itself no more;
yea, that is life.
Make this forenoon sublime, this afternoon a psalm, this night a prayer
And time is conquered and thy crow is won."

SOMETHING TO EAT

Tuna fish has been called the turkey of the sea. The following dish is California Chicken Pie.—Take a large can of tuna, two carrots diced, two medium-sized potatoes diced, one medium-sized onion chopped, one cupful green peas, one tablespoonful of butter, two tablespoonfuls of flour, one cupful of milk, one teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of pepper, and paprika. Boil the carrots and potatoes, onions and peas together until tender in a small amount of water, salted. Make a white sauce, melting the butter, adding the flour, and, when smooth, the milk and seasoning. When well-cooked remove from the heat. Line a baking dish with plain pastry, fill with the vegetables in layers, cover with a layer of fish; repeat until all are used. Cover with a crust in which vent holes are placed and bake until the crust is brown.

Date Crumbles.—Beat two eggs, add one cupful of sugar, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one tablespoonful of flour, one cupful each of chopped walnuts and dates. Mix all together and spread on two greased pie tins. Bake in a slow oven three-quarters of an hour. Crumble and serve in tall glasses mixed with whipped cream lightly sweetened and flavored.

Special Care of Baby.

That Baby should have a bed of its own all are agreed. Yet it is more reasonable for an infant to sleep with grown-ups than to use a man's medicine in an attempt to regulate the delicate organism of that same infant. Either practice is to be shunned. Neither would be tolerated by specialists in children's diseases.

Your Physician will tell you that Baby's medicine must be prepared with even greater care than Baby's food.

A Baby's stomach when in good health is too often disarranged by improper food. Could you for a moment, then, think of giving to your ailing child anything but a medicine especially prepared for Infants and Children? Don't be deceived.

Make a mental note of this:—It is important, Mothers, that you should remember that to function well, the digestive organs of your Baby must receive special care. No Baby is so abnormal that the desired results may be had from the use of medicines primarily prepared for grown-ups.

SIMPLE MATTER TO ARRANGE

All Colored Woman Had to Do Was to Go Home and Wait for Her Next Husband.

A colored woman entered a police station and asked the sergeant at the desk:

"Does you gin any advice here?"

"Sometimes we do," was the reply.

"Den I want you to gin me some. I has got a husband, but he don't amount to much. He has got it in his head dat he wants to go up in de air wid one of dose flyin' machines. If he goes up am he liable to fall?"

"Yes, he is sure to," replied the sergeant.

"An' will be killed?"

"Yes, certainly he will be killed."

"An' den I will be a widow?"

"Yes."

"An' arter a y'ar some smart cull'd man will want to marry me. Now, den, would you encourage my husband to fly?"

"Yes, I think so."

"All right, den," said the colored lady as she made for the door. "I will go right home an' encourage my husband to go up among de clouds an' den I will sit down and wait fur my next husband."—Exchange.

LANDLORD WANTED TOO MUCH

Under the Circumstances, Few Men Could Have Been Expected to Carry Out Threat.

"Sir," said a colored man who entered a police station, "I came here to tell you dat I was gwine to suicide."

"For what reason?" asked the sergeant at the desk.

"Bekase dar was no mo' joys at my house. Am it agin de law to jump into de river?"

"No, not exactly," was the reply. "But if you get out again that is against the law, and you also get very wet, and apt to catch cold over it. You had best find some empty old house and shoot yourself."

"Yes, sir, dat am de way," answered the colored man.

He went out to return in an hour to say:

"You see, I didn't suicide after all. I found de empty house and also found de landlord dar, and he wanted $75 a month rent and $10 extra fur holdin' an inquest."

Left Him No Escape.

"If you feel that way, why did you propose to the woman?"

"I didn't. She proposed to me."

"But you could have refused her."

"No, I couldn't. She said, 'Will you marry me? Have you any objection?' So whether I'd said 'yes' or 'No,' she'd had me either way."

"Well, you shouldn't have answered her."

"I didn't, so she said, 'Silence gives consent,' and that settled it."—Boston Transcript.

LAXATIVE ~for Aged People

THE BANE of old age is constipation. The bowels become weak and unable to perform their functions without aid. For this purpose only the mildest and gentlest laxative should be used. The use of harsh cathartics aggravates the trouble and makes the constipation worse. Chamberlain's Tablets are a favorite with people of middle age and older on account of their gentle action.

Old Si Chestnut says: "An advertisement should be like a woman's dress—long enough to cover the subject, but short enough to be interesting."

All right. Here goes. Our subject: A check on our bank is better than a U. S. Treasury Note. Why? Because, if you loose your Treasury Note by fire, theft, hold-up or accident, it is gone for good, that's all. But if the same accident should happen to a check on our bank, yau can stop payment and have a new check issued. Is that short enough to be interesting?

High School Notes

GENERAL:

The State Department requires that each school fly the American flag during the hours that school is in session. We are now meeting this requirement.

School will be dismissed Friday, (Sept. 22) in order to give the pupils an opportunity to attend either the Hicksville or Kendallville fair. Friday is the big feature day at the Hicksville fair. Since we are dismissing for one day an absence for this purpose on any other day will be inexcusable. This is no regular holiday therefore school will have to be in session some Saturday during the school year.

The Northeastern Indiana Teachers' Association will meet in Fort Wayne, October 13, 14. The Indiana State Teachers' Association will be in session at Indianapolis from October 19th, to 21st. The teachers are contemplating attendance at one of these conventions.

The Progressive Song books to be used in the grades have arrived. Most of the books that have been ordered are now ready for distribution. Some students are neglectful about purchasing the books that they have ordered and we feel that parents should give this their attention.

Fire Scare At The Garage

What might have resulted in a bad fire Monday while H. E. Randall was cleaning the engine of the E. R. Kindey touring car, was prevented by the quick action of the machanics. Gasoline caught fire that was being used to clean with, from a shorted wire. Mr. Randall suffered some burns on his face and arm and had part of his front hair burned rather too close to his head for comfort. He considers himself fortunate however that prompt action in pushing the car back from over a pool of gasoline on the floor and cleaning pan saved not only himself from serious burns but the car from damage as well.

Sustains Broken Rib

Harvey Lindley, residing three miles west of town experienced a peculiar and what might have been a serious accident Thursday forenoon when he started down the lane from the home to the road with a load of wood. As the load started down a hill the pin failed to hold the wagon tongue from slipping through the neckyoke, the wagon ran on the horses heels causing them to run. Mr. Lindley was unable to control the team and wagon and they ran into the deep creek throwing him hard enough to break a rib and to jam his side up badly.

M. P. Church Notes

There never was a time when people should know what the church stands for as today. The reasons are many. Among the many reasons, one we may mention, and this is it; does this church make any attempt to interpret the whole program of God?

I am sure that we all are anxious that our church shall progress and be of great benefit in the community. Every church member wants their church to be prosperous. The way it shall be prosperous is a great question.

Next Sunday we want to outline a program in the morning service that will be a program we wish to follow for the ensuing year.

Will you be there? The church will not be all it could be unless every one is there to share their responsibility.

There will be special music and a special service. We can call it a home coming. A gatherihg to the house of God to hear and give expression to our faith.

American Farm Bureau

One of the most valuable services which the Michigan State Farm Bureau federation gives its members is through its seed department. The sorting, standardizing, grading and selection of the best seeds is handled in a separate department. Farmers are assured that the best seeds for their purpose are available. This picture shows the standard sacks of timothy, alfalfa and oats ready for distribution.

WORK FOR IMPROVED VARIETIES OF WHEAT

Farm Bureaus in Ohio Join With Seed Association and Millers for Higher Qualities.

Farm bureaus in a number of counties in Ohio have been working with the Ohio Seed Improvement association for some time in the improvement of their varieties of wheat. Now they are joining with millers in promoting these same wheats and also to improve flour milled from Ohio wheats.

Those in this work have been endeavoring to get the farmers to grow Trumbull, Portage, Gladden and other improved wheats from the standpoint of increased yield per acre. Experiments recently completed have proven that these wheats are superior in milling qualities to the common wheats grown in Ohio. Millers in a number of sections are willing to try out these wheats and are paying a premium for improved wheats because of the better milling qualities. Farmers' elevators are keeping these wheats separated from common wheats so that they can sell in carload lots. A large quantity of improved variety wheat that failed to pass certification standards for seed purposes are available for this purpose this year.

Bread Made From Two Kinds of Ohio Wheat Showing the Difference in Quality—Loaves on Left Made From Trumbull Wheat.

On a number of the "wheatfield tours" boosting improved seed wheat, samples of bread from flour made from different kinds of wheats were passed around among those present. In all cases they agreed that the flour from the improved wheats made the best bread. In one cooperative experiment, women who were leaders in projects in their respective townships were called in for a demonstration. Eight different women made bread from two kinds of flour—that made from Trumbull and that made from Red Wave wheat. In each case the bread made from Trumbull wheat flour was superior.

FIGHT TAX-FREE SECURITIES

Nothing but Havens for Wealthy Who Wish to Escape Paying Their Proportion.

"Tax-free securities are nothing more or less than havens for the rich who wish to invest their money and escape paying their proportion of the expenses of the government," said H. C. SAME ORGANIZATION FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Directors of Indiana Federation Believe Working Together Is Necessary.

The directors of the Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations realize that the organization can never fulfill the possibilities that lie before it without the support and cooperation of the farm women. The close partnership existing between the farm home and the farming business makes a working together absolutely necessary if the full value of the organization is to be realized. As set forth in the constitution of the Indiana Federation of Farmers' associations, it is the purpose of the association to protect the economic, business, educational, legislative and social interests of the farmers of the state, and when these phases of the work are being considered, it necessarily involves the activities of the farm women. The Indiana directors believe that it is not necessary to have a separate organization, duplication of officers, or anything of that kind, but merely the united effort of farm men and women in the same organization.

In Indiana it has been arranged so that a farmer's wife or daughter, where there is already one fully paid up member in the family, may become a member of the local township, county, state and national organization with the payment of $2.50 annually. This fee is divided up with $1 for the county or township, $1 for the Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations and 50 cents for the American Farm bureau. This plan of organization was worked out at a state meeting of farm women held in Indianapolis, with the recommendations that a committee of farm women, one representing each of the ten federation districts, be selected to suggest such additions to the progress of work of the state organization as would take in the interests of the farmer from all angles, as outlined above, in a way that would enlist the interest and co-operation of the entire community. This committee of ten in their recommendations provided for the increased interest in social activities of the community with a special educational and health program.

Although the total enrollment of farm women members in the Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations has not reached large numbers, as yet, still the interest is growing rapidly and where aroused to the needs and conditions, they are willing to give their time and talents along with the men, to establishing an organization whose object is to insure a more permanent, stabilized and profitable agriculture for the generations to come, which means the essentials for the establishment of home and community life of the highest type.

CELERY, CONSIDERED AT ONE TIME AS NOVELTY, NOW IMPORTANT CROP

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

From a crop that was a novelty and served on the tables of only a few people to an industry that has produced as many as 17,000,000 crates in a year has been the development of celery production within the memory of many people now living. With the rapid increase in the growing of the crop, methods of culture and marketing have materially changed, new diseases and pests have appeared, and a number of problems have arisen. Because of these new problems and difficulties, the United States Department of Agriculture has just issued Farmers' Bulletin 1269, Celery Growing, by W. R. Beattie, in which are discussed the fundamentals of successful production, including the best methods of growing and handling the crop.

The crop can be grown on almost any type of soil if enough plant food is present and water is supplied during the dry periods, but most of the successful celery-growing enterprises are on low-lying muck, or "hammock" soils. Under present-day conditions it is not practicable to depend entirely on manure as a fertilizer and large quantities of commercial fertilizer are used, growers in the northeastern part of the country using from 1,400 to 1,800 pounds of high-grade plant food to the acre. Florida growers sometimes use as much as three tons to the acre. But not all of the discussion is devoted to the commercial growing of celery. There is a chapter on producing the crop in the home garden, and many of the practices that have been developed are applicable no matter on what scale it is grown.

Copies of the new bulletin may be obtained free by writing to the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington.

Was Once a Luxury.

Celery was once a fall and winter luxury associated with turkey and cranberry sauce, but now it is eaten during the entire year and the production of "early" celery has become a big business. Most of the commercial crop is grown in the region of the Great Lakes, and also in New Jersey and Massachusetts, in Florida and in California. The muck soils of the northwestern section are of the right texture, usually high in nitrogen but deficient in potash and phosphorus. In addition to muck soils, good crops are grown on level sandy loams, such as are found in the vicinity of Rochester, N. Y., in northeastern New Jersey, on Long Island, and in many other localities.

Commercial fertilizers used as a rule contain about 4 to 7 per cent of nitrogen, 8 per cent of phosphoric acid, and 6 or 7 per cent of potash. The mixed fertilizer is usually followed by one or two side dressings of nitrate of soda or sulphate of ammonia during the growing period in the field. Where manure is used it is usually applied in the fall and plowed under, then returned to the surface in the spring by replowing, or is composted and spread over the land after plowing and disked into the soil the same as commercial fertilizer. Most muck soils are easily put in the right condition and require only plowing and about two diskings and two draggings. More diskings and draggings, however, are needed on newly reclaimed mucks.

Seed Largely Imported.

Most of the celery seed is imported, but there are a few producers of high-grade seed in the United States and some growers grow their own seed. The old idea was that strictly fresh seed is necessary, but recent experiments have shown that four-year-old seed gives greater freedom from disease and in many respects is preferable to fresh seed. However, much depends upon the way the seed has been handled, as great changes of temperature reduce its vitality. There are approximately 14,000 celery seeds in an ounce and 21,000 to 60,000 plants are needed to set an acre, but not every seed can be relied upon to produce a good plant. Four ounces of extra good seed is usually enough to provide plants for an acre, but most growers use eight to twelve ounces. In three to five weeks after the early crop seed is sown the plants are transplanted to trays, to greenhouse benches or to cold-frames, and later to the fields. For the later or standard crop the plants are usually grown in field beds.

For the home garden 200 or 300 plants can be started in a cigar box or in a wooden tray in the house, but as a rule it is more economical to buy the small number of plants needed. Special care is needed during the first two weeks after the seed is sown to see that the soil does not dry out and after the plants come up that they are not overwatered. There are many important details to the setting of the plants in the field, but even the commercial fields are set by hand, though the department suggests that there is no reason why a suitable machine for doing the work should not be developed.

Celery is a moisture-loving plant, and it is frequently necessary to employ irrigation unless the soil is naturally moist. Three systems are employed: The overhead sprinkler system, the furrow or surface system, and the underground or subirrigation system. It has been found that the first of these is generally the most adaptable. Since the plants are greatly injured by wilting, successful growers watch the soil moisture conditions closely and apply water before any wilting of the leaves occurs. Some successful growers in the northeastern district do not use irrigation. They depend upon having the soil in good condition and well supplied with organic matter, and upon thorough and frequent cultivation.

Celery is subject to the attacks of diseases from seedbed to market. Damping-off is the principal danger in the seedbed, but this can usually be controlled satisfactorily by care not to overwater and by giving plenty of ventilation. Plants in the field suffer from early and late blight, bacterial blight, Sclerotinia rot and black-heart. There are rots that attack the product in storage or in transit. Blights spread rapidly during periods of moist and sultry weather, and even during bright weather, when the plants are growing rapidly, spraying is necessary to be on the safe side. The storage blights or rots usually have their origin in field diseases. Control is based upon crop rotation and spraying with bordeaux mixture to prevent them. A reading of the bulletin will give a thorough understanding of the approved methods of control.

Results of Experience.

The experience of many successful growers and the results of experimental tests on blanching, harvesting, storing and shipping are given in considerable detail. Although it is an expensive crop to grow and market, most growers have paid little attention to cost accounting, and conditions vary so much from year to year and in different regions that it is difficult to give figures of real value. The principal items of expense are: Interest on investment, plowing and fitting the land, drainage and irrigation, fertilizing, growing the plants, setting and cultivating, spraying, cost of boards or paper used in blanching, labor, selling costs and washing. It is safe to assume, says the department, that the grower who is not making a profit of from $200 to $300 an acre or more is falling short of his goal, but the only way to know what profit is being made is to keep a careful cost account to balance against the returns.

LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 24

REVIEW: THE EXILE AND THE RESTORATION

DEVOTIONAL READING—Ps. 66:1-5, 16-20.

GOLDEN TEXT—The Lord hath done great things for us: whereof we are glad.—Ps. 126:3.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Selected Stories Retold.

JUNIOR TOPIC—How God Restored His People.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Leaders in the Restoration of Israel.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Lessons From the Exile and Return.

Two methods of review may be employed to advantage.

1. Character Study. Assign the outstanding heroes of the quarter's lessons to members of the class and have them to report. This assignment must be made the week previous, e. g. Ezekiel, the prophet of God; Daniel, the statesman; Ezra, the teacher of God's word, etc.

2. Summary of Contents. This is a good method at all times. It can be adapted to different grades. The following is a suggested method:

Lesson I. Before Ezekiel was commissioned as a prophet he was given a vision of the Almighty. After that he was given an experimental knowledge of God's word—he ate the book—digested and appropriated its contents. An experimental knowledge of God's word is essential.

Lesson II. Because Daniel besought the Lord he was able to make known the king's dream and interpret it. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God (Jas. 1:5).

Lesson III. While Belshazzar and his lords were engaged in drunken revelry a mysterious hand recorded Divine judgment. There is a day coming when men shall be judged. Happy is the man who has fled to Christ, for to such there is no judgment (John 5:24).

Lesson IV. Daniel's sterling worth brought him to the front—he was elevated to be prime minister of the Persian empire. Moved by jealousy certain wicked men plotted his downfall. Because of a flawless record in business they trumped up a charge against him on the ground of his foreign religion. Though the king executed the foolish decree Daniel was delivered and his accusers were cast into the den of lions and destroyed.

Lesson V. Though Israel went into captivity as a chastisement of the Lord, in due time He recovered them. God's covenant and judgments are sure. He can move a heathen king to freely fulfill His own good pleasure and purpose.

Lesson VI. In the restoration of the people to their own land, the first thing necessary was the provision of a place for the worship of God. As soon as this work was begun, violent opposition was in evidence. That which God sets out to do shall be completed, though all hell oppose.

Lesson VII. Haman's wicked plot against the Jews was frustrated by Esther's shrewdness and courage. Those who plot against and hate God's covenant people shall be brought to destruction.

Lesson VIII. Through Zerubbabel the people were brought back and established in their own land, but they had gone far away from God. There was now need of a religious leader. Ezra was moved by the Spirit of God to lead them back to fellowship. Because Ezra sought the Lord his way was prospered. Success always comes to those who trust God.

Lesson IX. When Nehemiah heard of the distress of his brethren at Jerusalem, he took the matter to the Lord in prayer. Their sorrow and distress was his sorrow and distress. Is any afflicted, let him pray (Jas. 5:13).

Lesson X. When Nehemiah began the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem he encountered violent opposition from without and from within. His faith in God moved him to go straight on with the work and he had the joy of seeing the work completed.

Lesson XI. The method used in bringing back the people to God was the word of God. Because God's word was made plain to the people they repented of their sins and rendered obedience to God.

Lesson XII. Malachi as an aid to Nehemiah in effecting reforms pointed out the sins of the people, viz: Base ingratitude, a corrupt priesthood, mixed marriages, robbing God by withholding tithes, etc., pointing to a day of judgment when righteous retribution would be meted out to the wicked and rewards would be given to the faithful.

RADIO

THREE SOURCES OF PLATE POTENTIAL

Use of Step-Up Transformer and Rectifying Tubes Recommended for Amateurs.

The greatest drawback in the use of vacuum tubes for radio transmitters is a suitable source of direct current potential for the plate circuits. In general there are three sources, batteries, a motor-generator set, and rectified alternating current. The alternating house lighting current can be stepped up to the required potential by means of a transformer and then rectified by an electrolytic rectifier, by the use of vacuum tubes manufactured for this purpose.

The use of batteries as a source of plate current potential is limited to very low power sets that are used infrequently, and then only for short intervals. Sufficient capacity in the form of "B" batteries would mean not only a relatively high first cost but also an extremely high maintenance cost. A motor-generator set, while high in first cost, will leave an extremely low maintenance cost and deliver a potential that only varies slightly, due to the commutator ripple. In sections where direct current is used for house lighting, a motor generator set is the only practical and satisfactory source of plate potential. Taking first cost, maintenance cost, convenience and space required into consideration, the best way to obtain the required current potential for the operation of vacuum tube transmitters, is by the use of a step-up transformer and rectifying tubes.

A line of vacuum tube rectifiers is on the market under the name "kenotrons." These tubes have been designed to have the proper operating characteristics to rectify alternating curent for the line of transmitting tubes put on the market by the same company.

If radiotron transmitting tubes are used it is only necessary to build or purchase a transformer with a filament heating winding and a plate current winding and by the use of kenotrons for rectifiers. The entire power to operate the transmitting set can be taken from the alternating current house lighting circuit.

It is possible to use an electrolytic rectifier in order to rectify the plate potential after the 110 volt house lighting circuit has been stepped up by means of a transformer. Electrolytic rectifiers are probably the cheapest source of plate potential, but they are sloppy and demand a lot of care and attention.

To operate the standard five-watt transmitting tube, known as radiotron type UV 202, a plate voltage of 350 is required and the plate current per tube is 45-100 of an ampere. The filament requires 2.35 amperes at 7.5 volts. Rectifying tubes known as kentron type UV 216 are made to be used in conjunction with the five-watt transmitting tubes. The rectifier tubes are so designed that one rectifier will rectify sufficient current at the correct potential to operate one transmitting tube.

Figure "A" shows how a single transformer can be used to furnish all of the necessary plate and filament current for a tube transmitter.

ALERT RADIO DEALER LEARNS

Not Only Stocks His Shelves With Goods, but Takes Lessons in the Art.

Besides stocking his shelves, the progressive merchant in radio is also employing some of the summer in replenishing his mental supplies of radio information. The taking of courses in the art, either by mail, or through the very convenient form of carefully prepared lessons in a magazine, or from a competent instructor, is highly desirable, says Radio Merchandising. The business part of radio is going more and more into the hands of men who have basic knowledge of electricity and telephony. This, then, is the season for stock-taking, not only of the contents of the show cases, but brain pans.

Many alert merchants are employing themselves with diligence along these lines, because they realize more and more that from now on the trade will go to the dealers who can provide service vitalized by actual knowledge. When the vendor is thoroughly grounded in the art he need have no fear of summer doldrums nor of static of any kind, commercial or mental. The calling of radio merchandising is a foe to inertia in every form.

INDIANA BREVITIES

A wool crop of excellent quality has been gathered in Blackford county this year, farmers report, but the quantity is slightly under normal.

Safe crackers worked the combination on the Standard Realty and Theater company's theater at Clinton and escaped with between $1,300 and $1,400.

The final examination to be given this year by the state board of pharmacy for candidates who desire licenses as registered pharmacists or registered assistant pharmacists will be held October 9, 10 and 11, at the Statehouse, it was announced at Indianapolis.

The state board of tax commissioners denied a petition of the city of Bloomington to issue $100,000 in bonds for the extension of the city water works plant. The order of the board said the proposed bond issue would not provide the city the amount of water contemplated. It was also stated that the amount to be paid for the site for the extension was excessive.

Following closely upon a voluntary visit to the federal authorities at Hammond, when he placed in the hands of federal officers valuable evidence regarding the workings of the Gary "vice ring," Judge Henry Wellnes, a Gary pioneer, was seized with sudden illness and died at a hospital. A postmortem revealed a heart attack brought on by excessive heat.

A cut of 8 per cent in the Anderson school budget for 1923, as compared with the estimates for 1922, was announced by the board of school commissioners. The board reduced estimates more than $26,000 and announced that a plan for a new high school gymnasium and other building improvements had been abandoned.

The Indiana Steel and Wire company of Muncie, manufacturers of various grades of wire, the plant of which has been shut down two weeks because of a lack of coal caused by the strike, has resumed operations. The company believes it has arranged for fuel supplies that will enable it to keep the factory operating indefinitely. Four hundred men are employed in the plant.

More than half of the pupils who were graduated from the Wabash high school last June will enter college this year, the principal at the school has announced. The majority of the pupils will enter state colleges, with Purdue university, Indiana university and Wabash college being favored the most. The list of those to enter college from Wabash contains 69 names.

Three young men, John F. Knoob and Edward Trouy of New Albany, and Charles Cavanaugh of Louisville, Ky., were drowned in the Ohio river while swimming at a bathing beach on the Kentucky side of Sand island. Edward Frei of New Albany, another member of the bathing party, was saved by J. B. Foster, who was rowing about in a skiff. An undercurrent was said to be responsible for the triple drowning.

The average corn crop of the state on September 1 was only 82 per cent of normal and indicated a production of 6,500,000 bushels less than the estimate made August 1, says George C. Byrant, state agricultural statistician, in his semi-monthly report on crop conditions to the United States Department of Agriculture. Other crops also show a decline in conditions as a result of the hot, dry weather, together with some storm and hail damage, the report says, but fruit crops generally were not affected.

The city of Tipton filed a petition with the public service commission asking authority to add a 15 per cent surcharge to the electric service during September, October and November. Tipton owns and operates its electric utilities. In the petition the city said that between January 1 and June 1 of this year it cost $7,242 more to operate the plant than was collected for service. The present high cost of freight, coal, labor and materials makes it impossible to operate without the surcharge, it was alleged. This is the first petition for a surcharge on the basis of the high cost of coal, labor and freight since the acute war-time days.

What is said to be the highest price a front foot ever paid for real estate in Indiana was paid a few days ago for the property on the northwest corner of Meridian and Washington streets, Indianapolis, occupied by the Merchants Heat and Light company building which was sold by the Union Trust company of Indianapolis as executor of the estate of James E. This is about [illegible] a front foot or nearly twice as much as the previous high price for real estate in the state.

Operations at the Gary plant of the Illinois Steel company are increasing and both bankers and business leaders report finance and business on the upgrade.

An increase of $4 a ton over the usual price was paid a few days ago for two car-loads of coal received by the Columbus Gas Light company. The price was $9.02 a ton, delivered, from Kentucky mines.

Taxes amounting to $105,186.48 were collected illegally from citizens of Wayne township, Allen county, living outside the city of Fort Wayne, during the period from 1914 to 1920, according to a report of the state board of accounts filed with Jesse E. Eschbach, chief examiner.

A school physician will be employed by the school city of Terre Haute whose duties it will be to examine all children in the junior and senior high schools and the Gerstmeyer Vocational school, as well as all children in the public schools desiring to quit school because of physical ailments.

The termination of the nation-wide coal strike has not relieved the fuel situation in Terre Haute, and a scarcity of coal still exists, coal dealers say. Few of the dealers are doing any business in Terre Haute, and the few who have made the venture say that high prices have gained the upper hand.

Farmers of Madison and adjoining counties report that hot weather has matured corn so that it is beyond danger of an early frost, and the filling of silos will begin in a short time. The canning plants will be rushed for at least two more weeks handling the corn crop and probably three more weeks on the tomato crop.

Governor McCray's herd of thoroughbred cattle from the Orchard lake farm near Kentland was the big winner of premiums awarded at the Indiana state fair for Hereford cattle. Among the twenty-two premiums received by the prize herd were the first three premiums most sought by cattle breeders, which follow: Grand champion bull, best aged herd and best get of sire.

Charles W. Zeigler of Attica, chairman of the state highway commission, and John D. Williams, director of the commission, started on a motor tour of the state to inspect roads that may be included in the construction program of the commission in 1923. The highway between Brazil and Linton, about 35 miles long, is one of the roads to be visited, it was said.

That there is an unlimited market for purebred cattle and sheep from Indiana farms on the ranches of a number of Western states, and that the time is coming when cattle and sheep feeders of the Central West will have to depend on the breeders of their home states for animals needed to be conditioned for the packing houses, is word that George I. Christie of Purdue university brought to the Hoosier breeders at the Indiana state fair.

The mines along the Big Four railroad in Pike county are operating almost at full capacity, running from four to five days a week. The tonnage is almost normal, and only a scarcity of cars prevents the mines from operating on full time. Miners who have been working at other tasks are returning to their posts, and all the big mines in the county have a full force and are adding men every week. Mines along the Southern railroad are operating only two and three days a week because of the scarcity of cars. All small country mines are running full time.

A gift to Purdue university was announced at a banquet in honor of Dr. Edward Charles Elliott, the new president of Purdue university, given by the Purdue Alumni association of Indianapolis at Indianapolis. Henry W. Marshall, former acting president of the university, announced that David E. Ross, Purdue, 1893, and George Ade, Purdue, 1887, had presented to the university a 65-acre farm adjoining the campus. The tract is to be developed into a modern athletic field. The topography of the land is such that an ideal stadium can be erected without extraordinary expense. The two alumni recently purchased the land at an expense of $40,000.

On application in the Clay Circuit court for change of judge, Judge T. W. Hutchison appointed Judge James Hughes of Putnam county. The case is one in which about eighty miners, mostly of Vigo and Vermillion counties, are charged with riot as a result of an attack made on the Jones Brothers' coal mine near Staunton, which operated during the nation-wide strike of miners to supply Brazil factories. Nearly all of the defendants appeared and those who failed to appear were represented by attorneys. Russell Henderson, attorney for the miners, had issued a statement asserting that none of the defendants need appear. Judge Hutchison, hearing this, gave out the statement that those who failed to appear would be arrested for contempt of court. Mr. Henderson then made a public statement at Terre Haute, admitting his error, and the [illegible]

ROAD BUILDING

DISGUISING CRACK FILLERS

Unsightly Black Lines to Be Done Away With by Use of Material Colored Like Concrete.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Unsightly black lines, sometimes jagged and irregular, which mar the appearance of practically all concrete roads and which are due to the natural color of materials used to fill joints and cracks, will be avoided by the use of a material for the purpose developed in the laboratories of the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, if tests by actual use prove as successful as expected. This material has the same color as concrete, and when used to fill cracks and joints the surface has the appearance of a continuous and unbroken slab to the casual observer.

No particular advantage over other good materials is claimed for the preparation other than its color, and it is probable that the cost will be somewhat higher but not prohibitive.

For several weeks a section of road with expansion joints filled with this material has been under observation, and the results are entirely satisfactory, but a longer test will be necessary before it can be recommended for general use.

The mixture consists of approximately 12 parts rosin, 1 part crude rubber, with sufficient barium sulphate to give the desired color. In preparation the rubber is dissolved in gasoline, and the rosin is then mixed in with an application of heat, the coloring material being added as required. Any desired consistency can be obtained by varying the proportions. A material with remarkable adhesive properties is produced and which can be heated so that it will flow into the cracks and joints.

BUILD FEDERAL-AID BRIDGES

Nearly Fifty Miles Constructed in 35 States During Period of 4 Years and 4 Months.

More than $8,525,000 has been expended by the federal government, through the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, toward the building of bridges on federal-aid roads and highways in 35 states during the 4 years and 4 months ending November 1 last. That period dates back to the inception of the federal-aid road work as at present supervised.

Placed end to end, these bridges, each of which has been constructed in connection with the road work, would total 41.4 miles. Their estimated total cost is placed by the department at $20,235,200.18. It will thus be seen that approximately 42 per cent of the total was contributed by the federal government. The location of some of the chief projects and their total cost was as follows: Georgia, $2,950,474.59; New Jersey, $5,108,402.75; North Dakota, $1,306,384.59; Oklahoma, $2,280,769.76; South Carolina, $1,404,278.25, and Texas, $809,967.20.

Relief Is Found From Stomach Trouble

Hope for the millions of unfortunate men and women who are victims of stomach trouble is sounded by William Hoylen, of 16 Spring St., Bristol, Conn. Mr. Hoylen was a victim of stomach trouble in its worst form, but was completely restored to health by taking Tanlac. He says:

"For fifteen years I had attacks of stomach trouble, and had been in bed for three weeks when I got Tanlac, but three bottles built me up fifteen pounds, and made a well man of me. I am now eating steak and onions and feel just fine in every way."

Undigested food ferments in the stomach and soon the entire system is filled with poisons. Tanlac was designed to restore the stomach to a healthy condition and build up the whole body. Millions everywhere have acclaimed its wonderful power. Get a bottle today.

Tommy, age four, went with his sister, early in the spring, to pick violets in the woods near his home. One day, a few weeks later, he and his mother accompanied some friends on an automobile ride. A FEELING OF SECURITY

You naturally feel secure when you know that the medicine you are about to take is absolutely pure and contains no harmful or habit producing drugs.

Such a medicine is Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, kidney, liver and bladder remedy.

The same standard of purity, strength and excellence is maintained in every bottle of Swamp-Root.

It is scientifically compounded from vegetable herbs.

It is not a stimulant and is taken in teaspoonful doses.

It is not recommended for everything.

It is nature's great helper in relieving and overcoming kidney, liver and bladder troubles.

A sworn statement of purity is with every bottle of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root.

If you need a medicine, you should have the best. On sale at all drug stores in bottles of two sizes, medium and large.

However, if you wish first to try this great preparation send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

A rope made of 3,000 gopher (ground squirrel) tails was recently on display at the office of the Montana Extension Director, awaiting shipment to the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture. The rope was made by the blackfoot Indian chief, Split-Ear, and his tribal assistants, who live near Browning, in Glacier County, Mont. The Indians have taken an active interest in the campaign against rodents, and after burying more than 1,400 ground squirrels, decided to save tails for the 19 foot rope now on exhibition. It is estimated that at least 15,000 rodents were destroyed by the Indians.

PLAIN or FANCY

IF you have an Outside Door that opens to the West, North or East, and that's a big lot of territory, you doubtless know how sweetly kind it is to find a large and imprudent snowdrift on the door step.

There is a way around those drifts, and to those who have taken the cure we have nothing to say. But to you who have not been able to overcome this big mountain of trouble, let us make this one statement, "build a storm [illegible]. [illegible]

Duds for Fall Have the Call

Whoever is buying dresses and suits now is buying them for fall. Summer has passed out of our calculations, observes a fashion writer in the New York Times, as far as any purchases are concerned. To be sure, we are still wearing our summer clothes and glad we are to have them, too. But when we have to find any new frocks, why, then, of course, we are looking forward to another season, and are buying all necessary things with a view to wearing them on through months that are cooler. We say to ourselves: "Whatever I have now shall be suited for a more salubrious clime and never again shall I consider these flaming hours of the present. I am contemplating cool breezes and therefore, my clothes being ready, they must find me sooner or later."

Just now Paris is in the throes of having its openings. The new styles are being divulged to the buyers and lookers-on who are enjoying the showing in the midst of the heat. Those models will take some more weeks in which to filter through to this country to make their impression and their inevitable mark upon the styles which are our own. But for the actual present, we have some advance Parisian suits and dresses that show what the designers are doing in the way of foretelling the modes to come.

The ones that have been sent are most conservative in character, but, after all, isn't that the way of the truly French woman? She wishes to be conservative always while at the same time she is living up to all of the pre-established standards of a seasonable change in fashion. She is always smart, but she is never-ultra-evidently fashionable. She maintains her own character while she bows to fashion's ways. She is an artist in all that she does in the way of dress, and it is by studying her technique and her manner of dress that we are able to learn for ourselves in the way of perfecting our own attire.

Suits First in Favor.

Suits are the first things in the way of fall clothes that really strike into the soul of a woman. She must have something for street wear—and that as soon as the cooler days arrive. As a matter of fact, even while it is still hot, she begins to think of heavier suits, if only to cheer herself along. If by purchasing a new fall suit she can hurry along more comfortable living weather, then that is what she wishes to do and, at any rate, she can make herself believe that she is approaching more nearly more [illegible] weather.

There are two interesting suits, both made along somewhat the same lines with that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has been so [illegible] in Paris all summer and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible].

[illegible]

then repeated in places above the flaring cuffs and insertions inserted under the arms and above the low-lying belt. There are pockets on the narrow peplum made of series of folds and finished by little rows of decorative buttons attuned by their design and coloring to the harmony of the rest of the costume.

The skirts of these suits are quite plain, with only enough fulness allowed them to make them ample as to fit and hang. They are neither too loose nor too tight, but they have the happy faculty of carrying out the line of the coat perfectly and to the last degree of design. They are long. Yes, all of the newer skirts are longer than they were and, though these have not reached any ultra length, they are still reaching down toward the ground with recognizable persistency.

There is much to be said in this matter of skirts with reference to proportion. Much depends upon the height and general shape of the individual who wears them. The skirts take their length and lines from a pre-established contour of individual figure. They are subject to a harmonious adjustment with reference to other details of the costume and the purpose for which it is being worn.

Another little, long-waisted short coat is the latest development in dark blue serge. You know it is perfectly impossible for us to face a new season without some characteristic development having made itself felt in this standby material, this favorable fabric for all women whose wardrobes must be called upon to suit many occasions and many times.

Well, the blue serge suit this season, if we are to listen to the French, will be softer even than usual, and it will have many points of interest usually more characteristic of the dress than the suit. As shown in newer models, the coats will be long-waisted and there will be some sort of trimming that will help to enliven the general appearance of the costume, keeping it, at the same time, strictly tailored in design, or if not strictly, almost so.

Sleeves for suit coats will often be wide, so that they add that one atom of grace at a point where it is most desirable according to the present styles.

Now, the decoration on the serge suit described is done with a very fine embroidery of red and blue beads. Then the coat is lined with a soft bit of red crepe toning into the shading of the red beads. This makes a happy, if entirely inconspicuous, addition to the all-over blue and lifts the suit into that more informal class where the woman dressing for the approaching season will be happiest in her street clothes.

At the neckline there is no suggestion of a collar, the coat being quite flat against the throat. This gives a happy opportunity for the wearing of

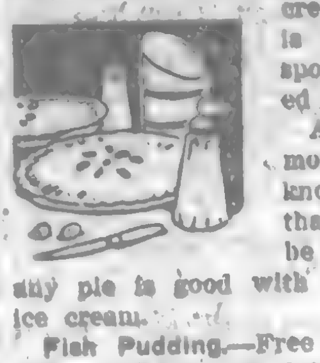
Just a plain apple pie may be made very stylish by a garnish of whipped cream into which is stirred a few spoonfuls of grated cheese.



Apple pie a la mode is so well known and liked that it need not be mentioned, yet any pie is good with a spoonful of ice cream.

Fish Pudding.—Free the fish from skin and bones and flake with a fork; there should be enough to fill a quart bowl lightly pressed down. Make a soft custard with a pint of milk and the yolks of six eggs; while warm stir in one-fourth cupful of butter, salt and pepper, one tablespoonful of Worcestershire sauce or anchovy paste softened with a little hot water, and two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice. Pour into a baking dish after mixing well with the fish, and bake in a slow oven.

Tomato Cocktails.—Prepare six peppers by cutting off the stem end; remove the seeds and white portion. Peel four tomatoes, cut in halves and squeeze out the seeds; chop one onion fine, put in a small cloth, tie and wash wringing out dry. Cut the tomatoes in cubes, add the onion and a light seasoning; fill the peppers and add French dressing. Dust the top with chopped parsley and serve.

Cafe Glace.—Fill iced tea glasses with cubes of ice leaving an inch space; add a lump or two of sugar and pour over hot coffee. Do not stir, but add cream immediately and serve. The flavor seems better than when the hot coffee is poured over the ice, cream and sugar.

A sweet omelet is a delicious luncheon dish. Add a teaspoonful of powdered sugar to the eggs and fruit jam or jelly is spread very thinly over the omelet before it is folded. Fresh fruits are cut fine and sprinkled with powdered sugar, spread on one-half of the omelet and fold over. In case of juicy fruits like the orange, the juice is saved and poured over the omelet, just before it goes to the table.

Rhodora! If the sages ask thee why
Thy charm is wasted on the earth and sky,
Tell them, dear, that if eyes were made for seeing
Then beauty is its own excuse for being.

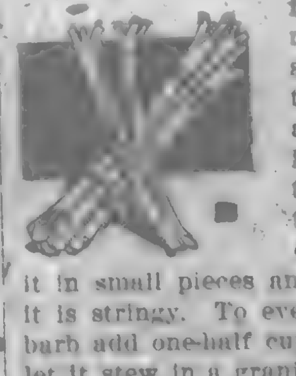
SEASONABLE GOOD THINGS

Did you ever make rhubarb jelly? September rhubarb is the kind to use for jelly, as that made in the spring will not thicken, owing to a lack of pectin in the fruit at that time. Wash the rhubarb, but do not peel it, cut it in small pieces and do not mind if it is stringy. To every pound of rhubarb add one-half cupful of water and let it stew in a granite saucepan until it is all in shreds. Strain through a cloth. Measure the juice and allow a pound of sugar to a pint of juice. Let simmer ten minutes then add the sugar and cook until it jellies when a little is dropped on a cold plate. Remove the scum carefully and turn into glasses. Cover with paraffin when cold.



Perfection Muffins. — Mix together three cupfuls of flour, one cupful of corn meal, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one tablespoonful of sugar and one teaspoonful of salt. Add two tablespoonfuls of shortening, three well-beaten eggs and two cupfuls of milk. Beat quickly and bake in well-buttered muffin pans.

PAIR OF RUBBERS

"It's really a shame," said the first rubber.

"A perfect shame," said the second rubber.

"Of course I don't know what we can do about it," said the first rubber.

"I don't suppose there is anything we can do about it," said the second rubber.

"On a really rainy day it is a different matter," said the first rubber.

"Entirely different," said the second rubber.

"Yes," said the first rubber, "on a really rainy day we are appreciated. But on other days when it looks like rain but doesn't rain how dreadful it is!

"I just heard some one say:

"'Isn't that just my luck! Here I brought along my rubbers and an umbrella and a raincoat and the sun has come out.'"

"And," said the second rubber, "her companion said:

"'Of coure that is always the way!'

"It does seem funny," the second rubber continued, "to hear the same old things again and again. Often when I'm on the street and passing other rubbers I hear their owners say such silly things and they say them as though they were the only ones who had thought up such speeches.

"Now, when some one says that it is just their luck and just because they brought rubbers and an umbrella along that it did not rain they believe that to be the truth.

"And yet you and I know that that has made no difference with the King of the Clouds.

"He hasn't looked down and having seen that lady with her rubbers and umbrella decided then that he would let Mr. Sun take the sky just to annoy her."

"Take the sky?" questioned the first rubber.

"Haven't you heard some one say of another that that person has taken the floor? Meaning, of course, that that person has been the speaker or principal one about at that time.

"Well, I can't speak of Mr. Sun as having taken the floor so I speak of him as having taken the sky," the second rubber explained.

"But it does seem so absurd to me to hear people talk. I've been in shops and some one will say:

"'Just because I particularly want that color ribbon of course they are all out of it.'

"And then I've been in a taxi-cab and my owner has said:

"'There! I was waiting until I got drenched for a taxi and none came along and now that I'm in one I see any number pass by.'

"Oh, how such speeches do amuse me. Well, it is a good thing we can find some amusement when we are only a pair of rubbers."

"Yes," said the first rubber, "I've heard such speeches, just as you have, and they, too, have amused me. Just as though our owner or any other person were singled out in such a way!

"But it is too bad we're not more popular. Dear me, dear me, how many of us have heard it said:

"'Oh, Mama, why do I have to put on rubbers? They're so hot and horrid. Please don't tell me I have to put on rubbers. The ground isn't really wet.'

"And then, too, [illegible] don't flatter us any more than they can help.

HAS ICE AT ALL SEASONS

Montana Indian, Digging Well, Seemingly Came Upon Most Remarkable Freak of Nature.

More than eight years ago John Spotted Wolf, an Indian of the Cheyenne reservation in eastern Montana, decided that he should like to have a well near his log cabin. So he and his wife Mary chose a spot near a large pine tree, perhaps 20 rods from the door, and then John began to dig.

By noon of the second day he had dug down ten feet. Although the weather was mild, he had complained of being cold while at work. After eating he put on an extra coat and went to work again. He kept Mary and her brother Rolling Bull busy hauling up and carrying away the dirt that he loosened. But in spite of John's extra clothing he still was cold. On the third morning he added more clothing; but when night came and the well had reached the depth of 18 feet he was almost frozen.

The next morning he again descended the well and worked as rapidly as his many layers of clothing would permit. After a while water began to appear. Suddenly he shouted: "Pull me up! Pull me up!"

John had barely reached the surface before the well filled to within a foot of the top and then began to freeze around the edges. In a short time only a small opening perhaps a foot in diameter remained.

The well remains the same way year after year, the Youth's Companion states. During the day in summer the sun melts the ice around the top, but at night it freezes again. The well, which furnishes a permanent ice supply for the people in the neighborhood, is a strange freak of nature of which there are so many in the western part of the state. Tourists who visit the reservation regard it as a great curiosity.

BETTER THAN DISH WASHING

Student Finds Occupation of Driving a Taxi Allows Him More Time for His Books.

The passerby stopped beside the taxicab parked near Bryant park, remarks the New York Sun. He had passed the same driver several times and had noticed he was reading. Once it was Plato's dialogues, another time John Ruskin's "The Stones of Venice," and now his interest was spurred to the questioning point by observing the driver was delving into Aristotle.

"I'm working my way through college," he said. "I heard about students who washed dishes and all that sort of thing. But taxi driving is the ideal job for the student. I don't start to work until late in the afternoon. I have a rush at only certain hours. The rest of the time I spend studying. You get plenty of time in between fares to learn the Euclid, the history of the pyramids, and why Ruskin is dead against too much purple in painting. I suggest taxi driving any time instead of waiting on tables."

Thought Photographed.

Commandant Darget of the French army and a noted military criminologist as well as psychologist, experiments in thought photography, resulting in pictures of objects suggested mentally, which, when projected from the mind to a highly sensitised photographic plate held against the forehead of a subject, leave a tangible impression of the object thought of at the moment.

If a criminal fears talking in his sleep, what double-distilled horror will he not know when he comes to realize that the very thoughts of his waking hours may be read at police headquarters as if in cold print, perhaps even more clearly than if he himself were present trying to evade questions?

Fish's Vision Limited.

To the fish the surface of the water, seen from below, presents a circular window surrounded by mirrors, according to Edward Ringwood Hewitt, author of "Secrets of the Salmon," soon to be published by Scribner's. It seems that a fish can see out into the air only through a limited aperture; everywhere else the surface reflects the contents of the stream, or (if it be a shallow one) the bottom. This is because the light rays passing from water to air are bent, and when the angle of the light ray from the fish's eye with the vertical becomes great enough, it is bent backward so that it does not enter the air at all, but is directed downward toward the bottom.

"UPON MY HONOR!"

SYNOPSIS.—During the height of the New Orleans carnival season Jachin Fell, wealthy though somewhat mysterious citizen, and Dr. Ansley, are discussing a series of robberies by an individual known as the Midnight Masquer, who, invariably attired as an aviator, has long defied the police. Joseph Maillard, wealthy banker, is giving a ball that night at which the Masquer has threatened to appear and rob the guests. Fell and Ansley, on their way to the affair, meet a girl dressed as Columbine, seemingly known to Fell, but masked, who accompanies them to the ball. Lucie Ledanois, recently the ward of her uncle, Joseph Maillard, is the Columbine. At the ball, Bob Maillard, son of the banker, again proposes to her and is refused. He offers to buy some of her property. A Franciscan monk interests her. He turns out to be Prince Gramont. In his library Joseph Maillard and a group of his friends are held up and robbed by the Midnight Masquer. Lucie Ledanois, the last of an old family, is in straitened circumstances. Joseph Maillard's handling of her funds has been unfortunate. Fell is an old friend of her parents and deeply interested in the girl. Henry Gramont, really the Prince de Gramont, is enamored of Lucie. Lucie talks with Fell about her affairs and the Masked Masquer. Gramont's chauffeur, Hammond, sergeant in the A. E. F., lives with him. He was the original Midnight Masquer, and Gramont had assumed the role. Where Hammond had been a robber for financial gain, Gramont, of course, is not. He arranges to return the "loot" to those whom he has robbed. Gramont and Hammond put the jewels and money in individual packages to be returned the next day. An explanation is inclosed in each. Ben Cacherre, an individual of unsavory character, appears to be associated with Jachin Fell. He has a peculiar interview with one Memphis Izzy Gumberts, notorious influential crook, in which there is significant reference to a mysterious "boss." Lucie summons Gramont to her home.

For a moment Gramont found himself unable to speak. He was thunderstruck by the sight of those unmistakable boxes. A glance at the calm features of the girl showed him that there was nothing to be concealed from her, even had he wished it. He was further stunned by this realization. He could not understand how the packages had come here. Recovering his voice with an effort, he managed to break the heavy silence.

"Well? I suppose you know what is in those parcels?"

She nodded. "Yes. One of them was opened, and the note inside was discovered. Of course, it gave a general explanation. Will you sit down, please? I think that we had better talk it over quietly and calmly."

Gramont obeyed, and dropped into a chair.

He was absurdly conscious of his own confusion. How had Lucie come into the affair? This staggered him above all else. Was she behind the theft of the loot? It must be. How long had she suspected him, then? He had thought Jachin Fell the sole danger point—he had never dreamed that this gray-eyed Athene could be tracing down the Masquer! He tried to visualize the situation more clearly and his brain whirled. He knew, of course, that she was fairly intimate with Fell, but he was not aware of any particular connection—

He glanced up at her suddenly, and surprised a glint of laughter in her eyes as she watched him.

"You seem to be rather astonished," she observed.

"I am." Gramont drew a deep breath. "You—do you know that those boxes were taken from my car?"

She nodded again. "Certainly. They were brought to me."

"Then you had someone on my trail?" Gramont flushed a little as he put the question to her.

"No. I have been chosen to settle affairs with you, that is all." It has been learned from the note in the opened box that you were not criminal in what you did."

She leaned forward, her deep eyes [illegible]

[illegible]

guilty of those things! It mortified me, it stunned me—until I realized the truth from the note. Even the fact that you did not do it for criminal ends does not relieve the sheer folly of the act. Why did you do it? Come, tell me the truth!"

Gramont shrugged. "The truth? Well, my chauffeur, Hammond, was the original Masquer. I caught him in the act—you remember I told you about him? After taking him into my employ, I became the Masquer."

"Why did you do it?" persisted the girl.

"Call it bravado, my dear Lucie. Call it anything you like—I can't lie to you! I had a motive, and I refuse to admit what it was; that's all."

"Aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

"Not particularly." He smiled. "I had a good end in view, and I accomplished it. Now that I'm all through, now that I've finished playing my little game, you happened to discover it."

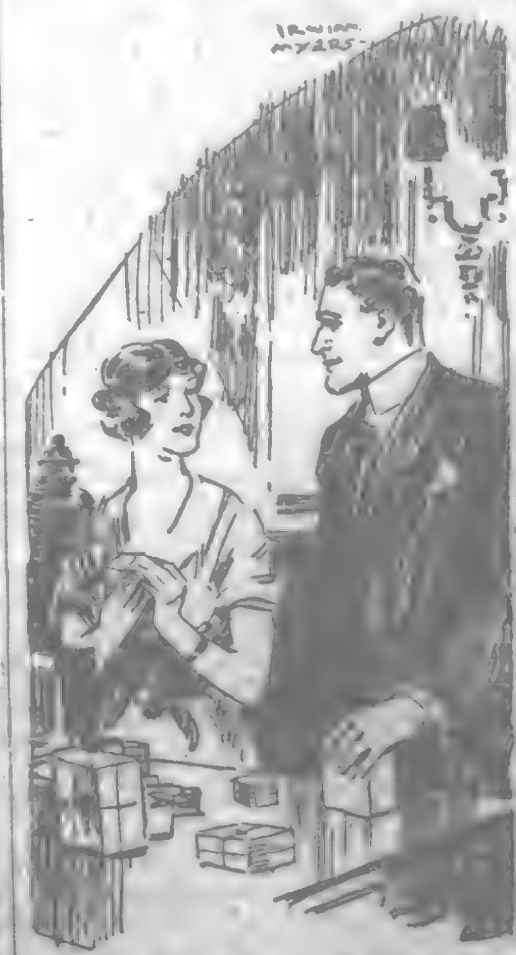
"I think you've been very silly," she said with a disconcerting calmness. He regarded her for a moment, steadily. "And you have displayed a fearful lack of judgment!"

"Silly! Well—perhaps. What are you going to do with those boxes?"

"I'll put them in the mail. I'm going downtown for luncheon, and will do it then. They'll be delivered this afternoon."

He nodded. "I had meant to have them delivered tomorrow; it makes no difference. You're the boss. It will give the good people a little more reason for jubilation tonight, eh?"

A sudden laugh broke upon his lips. "I'm beginning to see the humor of it, Lucie—and I know who put you next to me. It was Jachin Fell, the old fox! I suspected that he was on my trail, and I thought that he had managed the theft of those boxes. In fact, I was preparing to give him a big surprise this afternoon. But tell me, Lucie—are you angry?"



"No—Oil Is No Woman's Game, Unless She Can Afford to Lose."

She looked at him steadily for a space, then a swift smile leaped to her lips and she extended a pardoning hand. Her gesture and words were impulsive, sincere.

"Angry? No. I think you've some good reason behind it all, which you won't confide to me. I can read you pretty clearly, Henry Gramont; I think I can understand some things in you. You're no weakling, no romantic, filibustering crackbrain. And I like you because you won't lie to me. You've a motive and you refuse to tell it—very well! I'll be just as frank and say that I'm not a bit angry. So, that's settled!

"Now what was the big surprise that you just mentioned you were going to give poor Mr. Fell this afternoon?"

Gramont's eyes twinkled. "You remember that I thought he suspected me of being the Masquer? Well, I was going to [illegible] that we [illegible] occurred to me that if Jachin Fell had brains enough to run down the Midnight Masquer, he would be a mighty good business partner; because I'm poor on business detail. Also, I think Fell is to be trusted. He's very strong politically, I have found—although few people know it."

[illegible]

"But he's not interested in oil, is he?"

"I don't know; I take for granted that he's interested in making money. Most men are. The only way to make money in oil is to have money—and he has some! I have a little. I can put in twenty-five thousand. With an equal amount from him, we can sink a couple of wells, perhaps three. If we go broke, all right. If we find oil, we're rich!"

"But, my dear Henry, if he knew you to be the Midnight Masquer, do you think he'd want to go into business with you?"

"Why not?" Gramont laughed. "If he knew that I had brains enough to pull off that stunt and keep all New Orleans up in the air—wouldn't I make a good partner? Besides, I believe I have some notion where to go after oil; I'm going to examine your land first—"

"My good prince, you surely have no lack of audacity!" She broke into a peal of laughter. "Your argument about inducing Mr. Fell to go into business with you is naive—"

"But, as an argument, isn't is quite sound?"

"Possibly. Since it is Lucie Ledanois and not Jachin Fell who has brought you to a confession of your crimes against society—aren't you going to propose that she go into business with you? Doesn't the argument hold good with her?"

"No. Oil is no woman's game, unless she can well afford to lose. I imagine that you cannot, Lucie."

"You're right, I can't put in any money. I'm land poor. Unless I were to sell that Bayou Terrebonne land—it's an old farm, abandoned since before father died—"

"Don't sell it!" he exclaimed, quickly. "Don't consider any dealings with it until I have looked it over, will you?"

"Since you ask it, no. If there's gas near by, there must be oil."

"Who knows?" he shrugged. "No one can predict oil."

"Then you still mean to go to Jachin Fell with your scheme?"

Gramont nodded. "Yes. See here, Lucie—it's about noon! Suppose you come along and lunch with me at the Louisiane, if you've no engagement. We can put those boxes in the mail en route, and after luncheon I'll try and get hold of Fell."

She put her head on one side and studied him reflectively.

"You're sure you'll not kidnap me or anything like that? It's risky to become a friend of hardened criminals, even if one is trying to uplift them."

"Good! You'll come?"

"If you can give me ten minutes—"

"My dear Lucie, you are the most charming object in New Orleans at this minute! Why attempt to make yourself still more attractive? Gilding the lily is an impossible task."

"Well, wait for me. Is your car here? Good! I want to see Hammond's face when he sees us carrying out those boxes."

Laughing, the girl started toward the stairs. At the doorway she paused.

"One thing, M. le prince! Do you solemnly promise, upon your honor, that the Midnight Masquer is dead forever?"

"Upon my honor!" said Gramont, seriously. "The farce is ended, Lucie."

"All right. I'll be right down. Smoke if you like—"

In her own room upstairs Lucie closed the door and sat down before her dressing table. She made no move toward the array of toilet articles, however. Instead, she took a desk telephone from the table, and called a number. In a moment she received a response.

"Uncle Jachin!" she exclaimed. "Yes—it's just as we thought; it's all a joke. No, it was not a joke, either, because he had some motive behind it, but he won't tell me what it was. I'm terribly glad that you opened one of those boxes and found the letter—if you had gone to the police it would have been perfectly dreadful—"

"I never go to the police," said Jachin Fell with his dry chuckle. "You are quite satisfied that there is nothing serious in the affair, then?"

"Absolutely! He told me that he had accomplished his purpose, whatever it was, and that it's all ended. He just gave me his word that the Masquer was dead forever. Now, aren't you glad that you confided in me?"

"Very," said Jachin Fell. "Very glad, indeed."

"Now you're laughing at me—never mind! We're going to lunch downtown, and we'll mail those boxes on the way, by parcel post. Is that all right?"

"Quite all right, my dear. Did your gown come for tonight?"

"It's to come this afternoon."

Youngstown, Ohio.—"Last fall I began to feel mean and my back hurt me and I could hardly do my little bit of housework. I was played out when I would just sweep one room and would have to rest. I would have to put a cushion behind me when I would sit down and at night I could not sleep unless I had something under my back. I had awful cramps every month and was just nearly all in. Finally my husband said to me one day, 'Why don't you try Lydia E. Pinkham's medicine?' and I said, 'I am willing to take anything if I could get well again.' So I took one bottle and a second one and felt better and the neighbors asked me what I was doing and said, 'Surely it must be doing you good all right.' I have just finished my eighth bottle and I cannot express to you how I feel, the way I would like to. If you can use this letter you are welcome to it and if any woman does not believe what I have written to be true, she can write to me and I will describe my condition to her as I have to you."—Mrs. ELMER HEASLEY, 141 S. Jackson St., Youngstown, Ohio.

"I was very nervous and run-down," writes Mrs. L. E. Wiese of 706 Louisa St., New Orleans, La. "I would often sit down and cry, and was always blue and had no ambition. I was this way for over a year and had allowed myself to get into quite a serious condition. One day I saw your advertisement in the daily paper and began to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound at once. I have improved ever since taking the third bottle and find it is the best medicine I have ever taken."

Benefited by First Bottle

"I was completely run down and not able to do my housework. I just dragged myself around and did not have energy to get up when once I sat down. I read advertisements of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in our paper 'The Indiana Daily Times,' and learned all about it. I received results from the very first bottle and now I am doing all my own work, even washing and ironing, and I never felt better in my life. I tell all my friends it is due to you."—Mrs. ELIZABETH REINBOLD, 408 N. Pine St., Indianapolis, Indiana.

You should pay heed to the experiences of these women. They know how they felt before taking the Vegetable Compound, and afterwards, too. Their words are true.

Truly Clergyman Had Refrained From Blasphemy, but He Had Sinned in Another Direction.

A clergyman who years ago settled in Massachusetts once reproved a workman for swearing while he was plowing a new field.

"Swear!" said the man. "I guess you'd swear!"

Whereupon the preacher took the plow and hurried after it, indignantly denying the charge. Then, as the field became more impassable, he began panting:

"I never saw the like! I never saw the like!" When he had gone once round the field he stopped, breathless, and added:

"There, you see I didn't find it necessary to swear."

"No," said the other, "but you've told more'n 50 lies. You said you never did see the like, and you saw it all the time I was plowin'."

Youthful Fijian Proved Anew That Necessity Is the Fertile Mother of Invention.

A traveler from Fiji in the old days reports that at times in the past when the game was first introduced there the Fijians used to get waves of cricket madness, and in some outlying villages—where it was not so readily quelled by law—a match would be kept up for weeks on end. Incidentally, they wore their pads strapped on their naked, bootless legs with a very ludicrous effect. But evidently the Fijians have no sense of the ludicrous, for our traveler further reports: "Another distinguishing mark that rather amused me once up-country was when my house boy, Esau, came in one day with his hair cut away from one side of his head, looking like a somewhat weird 'parting,' for the remainder stood up as usual like a bass broom with bristles five inches long. I asked him what on earth he had been doing and he replied: 'Sir, I am now a member of the Lomaloma "A" team, and we have agreed to cut our hair like this, as the store cannot get 11 sashes all the same color.'"—London Tit-Bits.

NOTHING WORSE IN PROSPECT

Traveler Satisfied He Had Got Over the Most Uncomfortable Part of His Journey.

W. S. Inglis, the well-known coal operator, told a railroad story at a railroad men's banquet in Scranton.

"There used to be a little line," he said, "a branch line about 12 miles long, that was notorious for its bumps, general discomfort and dirt.

"A train on this line pulled into town one morning, late half an hour, as usual, and a man said as he rose and brushed himself off:

"'Well, thank goodness, the worst part of my journey is over.'

"'Goin' far?' said another man.

"'Hong Kong, China,' said the first chap."

Landor the Explorer.

Henry Savage Landor has a splendid record as an explorer. He was the first known white man to reach both sources of the Brahmaputra river of India and established their exact positions in Thibet. His exploration tours in the Himalayas also yielded a vast store of information. He later spent a whole year cruising among and studying the Philippine islands.

With a single partner, Mr. Landor traveled 3,800 miles on a pack saddle through Corea. Later he turned his attention to Africa spending several years there and then again changing his scene of action to South America where he traveled almost continuously until 1914.

"Covering the Subject"

Old Si Chestnut says: "An advertisement should be like a woman's dress—long enough to cover the subject, but short enough to be interesting."

All right. Here goes. Our subject: A check on our bank is better than a U. S. Treasury Note. Why? Because, if you loose your Treasury Note by fire, theft, hold-up or accident, it is gone for good, that's all. But if the same accident should happen to a check on our bank, you can stop payment and have a new check issued. Is that short enough to be interesting?

LIFE OF MRS. R. B. DAILY

Wife Of Local Christian Pastor Died Sept. 20

Funeral Services Held from Christian Church Sunday

Dora Annie Sands, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Sands, was born in Harrison County, Indiana, April 28, 1881, and died in Fort Wayne, Indiana, September 20, 1922, aged 41 years, 4 months and 22 days.

She united with the DePauw M. E Church in Harrison County at the age of eight years, and was united in marriage to Robert B Daily, April 29, 1899, at Elizabeth, Indiana. When her husband answered the call to the Christian ministry fourteen years ago she cheerfully followed him into that field of service and has labored faithfully and well for the good of humanity and the up building of Christ's Kingdom in every community where their lot was cast, at New Albany, Indiana, at Dayton, Ohio and at St. Joe, Indiana.

Aside from her church activities as teacher of a Sunday School class and as a member of the various organizations of the church, she was a member of the W. C. T. U., the Daughters of Rebekah, the Culture Club and the Choral Society. She was beloved by all who knew her. In the home she was a true wife and a devoted mother to their adopted daughter, Louetta. She was a good neighbor and a lover of children.

Besides the husband and daughter she is survived by her father, Daniel Sands, a sister, Mrs. Shirley Harris both of Louisville, Ky., and one brother, Oscar Sands, of Denver, Colo. Her mother died January 3, 1902 at New Albany, Ind., and one sister, Mrs. Will Reed, died November 15, 1921 at Louisville, Ky.

Her last illness extended over several weeks. In hope of relief she went to the Hope Methodist hospital at Fort Wayne, where an operation was performed. At first the results seemed hopeful, but a reaction took place and her death followed in a few days at 6:40 P. M. on September 20. She died in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ and has gone to her eternal reward, leaving a shining example and an enduring memory as the legacy of her life to family and friends.

The out of town friends who attended the funeral, which was held from the Christian Church in St. Joe at 2 o'clock Sunday afternoon, were Mrs. Shirley Harris of Louisville, Ky., Mr. and Mrs. D. C. Daily and son, Charles, and Mrs. Mary Daily of Ambia, Indiana, Mr. and Mrs. Will Gardener and Mr. and Mrs. Will Rhoades of Monroeville, Indiana, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Crane, Mr and Mrs. H. M. Marshall and children of Dayton, Ohio. Rev. Shaw of Auburn preached the funeral. The Hart's Girl Band of Hicksville, with which Miss Louetta was connected this summer, attended in a body as did the Daughters of Rebekah Lodge.

The ministers present were Rev. Shaw of Auburn, Rev. [illegible], Rev. Havens, Dr. Johnson, Rev. Ferguson of [illegible] and Rev. Hubbartt of [illegible]

Many Attend Defiance County Fair

The weather of the first part of last week appeared to discourage the many folks in the vicinity of St. Joe and Spencerville who desired to attend the Defiance County, Ohio, Fair at Hicksville. But when the sun shone out so bright Thursday morning all donned their slickest and drove to the fair, which has since been reported to be the biggest and best attended festival ever held at Hicksville. Many folks returned Friday taking others with them.

In the big Ford contest on Friday, F. W. Silberg, the "Lizzie" agent from Spencerville came close second to the agent of Edgerton, Ohio, in having the greatest number of "Little Universal Cars" in his section of the exhibition grounds Mr. Silberg also had on exhibition the big Lincoln car.

In the general farm produce exhibit with a great opposition Clyde Hart of near Coburn's Corners took first prize, W. W. Wilder, second prize and Fred Hart, third. I feel we were honorably represented.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT

Whereas, God in His wise Providence has removed from our midst Sister Dora Daily,

Be it therefore resolvad, that we, the members of the St. Joe Valley Rebekah Lodge extend to the bereaved family our heartfelt sympathy.

Resolved, that we bow in humble submission to the Will of Him, who doeth all things well.

Resolved, that we, as a lodge, deeply feel our loss, but realize our loss is her eternal gain.

Resolved that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of our beloved sister and a copy be recorded on the minutes of the lodge.

CONFERENCE WORKS OUT PLANS ON THE MARKETING OF LAMBS

Lambs Being Assembled in Big Dipping Yard Pens to Be Sent to the Various Markets.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Plans for the more orderly marketing of native lambs at Jersey City and New York city, and the elimination of violent fluctuations in prices of live and dressed lambs at these markets, are to be worked out by a committee representing live stock commission men, slaughterers, retailers, railroads, stock yard companies at Jersey City and New York, eastern lamb producers and the United States Department of Agriculture.

This committee was appointed as a result of the conference called recently by the United States Department of Agriculture, at Jersey City. At this conference members of the trade representing the various interests engaged in the handling, marketing, slaughtering and retailing of lambs at Jersey City and New York met representatives of sheep and lamb producers and the department. Practically all the factors responsible for the wide fluctuation in lamb prices at Jersey City during certain periods were brought out by full discussion.

The conference developed the fact that the lamb problem at Jersey City is a production and marketing problem combined, and that its solution lies largely in the hands of the producers and slaughterers of native lambs, although live stock commission men and retail meat dealers can assist in remedying the situation.

Occupies Key Position.

Jersey City occupies a key position in the channel of distribution between the lamb producers and the largest center of consumption, inasmuch as it is the final public concentration point for live lambs destined for New York city, the greatest consuming center for dressed lamb in the United States and a market that requires a high-grade product.

It was shown that ordinarily Jersey City has a reputation of being the highest lamb market in the country, but that during June, July and August it suffers violent price fluctuations because of the big increase in receipts of native lambs from Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Michigan and New York, without any material decrease in the supply of live and dressed lambs received there and at New York city from Western points. The situation is complicated by the marked irregularity in the volume of the daily receipts during those months and by the inferior quality of the offerings, most of which arrive unsorted and ungraded.

It was brought out that the poor quality of these lambs is due largely to the failure of producers to use better breeding stock and proper feeding methods and to dock and castrate their lambs at the proper time. The fact that native lambs in so many instances become infected in the summer months with diseases of parasitic origin, particularly stomach worms, makes it very important that they be marketed before the milk fat disappears.

These lambs usually are [illegible] at a period which requires that [illegible] be marketed during the [illegible] June, July and August, hence they are a perishable produce from a marketing standpoint. When they reach Jersey City in larger numbers than the demand can absorb, and come in competition with the heavy [illegible] dressed Western lambs, prices break sharply and affect the lamb market generally at all points. [illegible] the dressed market [illegible] drastic than those in the [illegible] delivery during stated periods is largely responsible for the irregularity in the daily receipts at Jersey City. If shippers would consign some of their lambs, particularly the lower grades, to other markets, where there is a better outlet, it would do much towards remedying the undesirable conditions at Jersey City and New York. Feeding stations established in the East as reservoirs from which to feed the market as supplies are needed also were mentioned as a means for remedying conditions.

Better Breeding Stock Urged.

Producers and commission men recommend that local and Western slaughterers co-operate by endeavoring to reduce the volume of their direct shipments and their shipments of Western dressed lambs to Jersey City and New York from Middle Western markets at periods when gluts are known to occur, in order to insure a supply no greater than the demand. It was also suggested that live stock commission men advise their patrons as to when gluts usually occur and when there are good reasons to believe one will occur, explaining fully what happens when undesirable and unfinished lambs are sent to the Jersey City market.

It was recommended that retailers feature lamb in their advertising and selling efforts during the period of excessive receipts and give consumers advantage of recessions in wholesale prices. Any steps taken along this line would encourage consumption and tend to check price fluctuations.

Personnel of Committee.

Although the movement of native lambs to market will soon be completed for the current year, the conference was unanimous in its desire to work out plans immediately which will insure more orderly marketing and less price fluctuation. The following committee was appointed to work to this end with representatives of the United States Department of Agriculture:

H. K. Nickell, United Dressed Beef company, New York; L. S. Joseph, vice president New York Butchers' Dressed Meat company, New York; George Kramer, United Master Butchers of America, New York; H. D. Wimer, Pennsylvania Railroad company, Philadelphia; George A. Shannon, vice president New York and New Jersey Live Stock Association, Jersey City; J. H. Meek, chief, bureau of markets, Richmond, Va., and R. C. Bonham, president and general manager Jersey City stock yards, Jersey City.

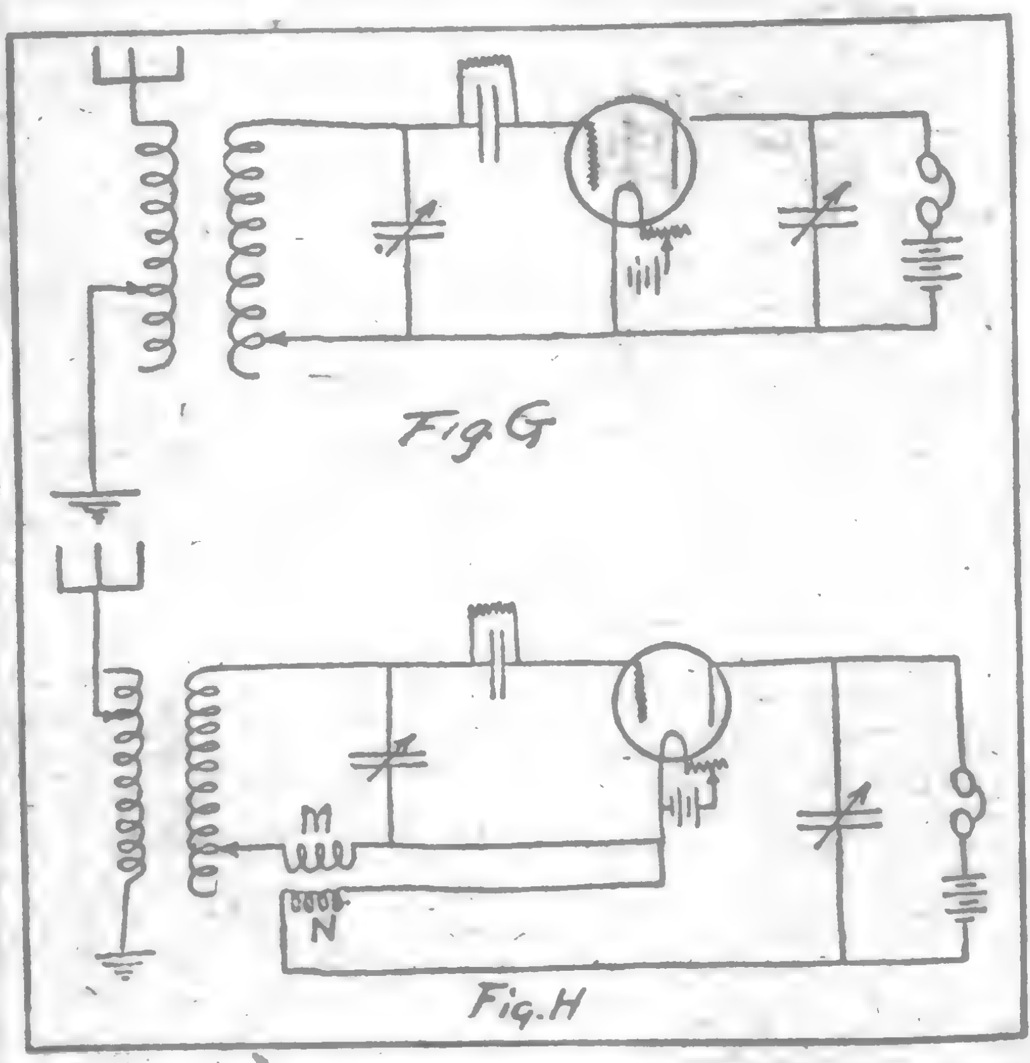
RADIO

GREAT DISCOVERY OF EDWIN H. ARMSTRONG

Arrangement by Which Local Plate Current Is Fed Back to Grid Circuit.

An ordinary three-electrode vacuum tube used as a detector in a circuit where the input is connected to the grid and the output taken from the plate circuit will give amplification of from 5 to 15. Adding to this amplifying action the stability of adjustment of the tube gave the tube preference over the crystal detector.



However, it was not until Edwin H. Armstrong made his great discovery of a circuit arrangement which fed back a portion of the large local plate current into the circuit through which the incoming signals arrived, thereby greatly amplifying the strength of the signal, that the vacuum tube reached its now recognized position of superiority as a detector of radio signals.

The circuit arrangement by which energy from the plate circuit of a three-electrode vacuum tube is fed back to the grid circuit is known by a different name, though, on account of the different names used and the different circuit arrangements used to accomplish the same results, amateurs are very apt to become confused. Some of the names given to the circuits which feed energy from the plate circuit to the grid circuit are "Feed Back," "Regenerative," "Tickler," "Tuned Plate" and "Ultra-Audion."

In Fig. F is shown a three-electrode vacuum tube with an alternator furnishing an alternating difference of potential to the grid circuit at T-T. The plate circuit of the tube is connected to a circuit containing an inductance L and a capacity C which together form a tuned circuit between the points X and Y. By adjusting the value of the variable condenser C, the natural period of the circuit between X and Y can be made to have the same frequency electrically as the alternating current supplied to the grid at T-T by the alternator. When this condition is reached the tuned circuit between the points X and Y becomes an infinite inductance in the [illegible] plate circuit. The potential [illegible] between X and Y are [illegible] and are exact [illegible] of the potential applied to the grid circuit by the alternator.

Going back to the simple type of [illegible] coming signal until a point is reached where the energy fed back from the plate circuit is just equal to the losses in the secondary circuit.

An increase in the coupling between the two coils M and N will cause the tube to oscillate. By changing the tuning of the secondary circuit, the frequency of the tube oscillations will be slightly different from the frequency of the incoming oscillations due to the received signals, and the beat note will be heard in the phones. The pitch of the beat note will be the arithmetic difference between the frequency of the incoming oscillations and the oscillations furnished by the oscillating detector tube.

The human ear is most sensitive to a note corresponding to 1,000 vibrations per second or electrically to a note produced by 500 cycles. Suppose the received signal was on a 200-meter wave length of 1,500,000 cycles. By adjusting the circuits so that the tube would oscillate at a frequency of 1,500,000 or 1,499,500, the beat note would be 500 cycle pitch or a 1,000 vibration note.

This beat method of reception is used to receive undamped or continuous wave signals and is called the "heterodyne" method. When the same tube is used to perform the functions of a detector and an oscillator, the method is termed the "autodyne" method.

PERFORMANCE TEST METHODS

Rules Are Drawn Up by Bureau of Standards for Investigation of New Apparatus.

Owing to the very large demand which has arisen for simple radio receiving sets, many retail dealers in other lines of work have taken up the handling of such equipment. It is very difficult for such dealers to decide whether sets offered by the manufacturers are of good or poor quality, says Radio Merchandising. The whole art is so new and some of the questions involved are so technical that the problem presents considerable difficulties.

As a consequence, the Department of Commerce, and particularly the bureau of standards, has received a great many requests for tests of such apparatus. As it is impossible for the bureau to conduct all the work of this nature which it would be called upon to perform, it has drawn up rules covering performance test methods which are to be carried out by the Electrical Testing Laboratories of New York in co-operation with the National Retail Dry Goods association, the latter representing the retailers of radio receiving sets. As the work develops, suggestions regarding improvements of methods of testing will be subject to the approval of the bureau of standards.

The tests outlined include: Investigation as to the material and workmanship, the mechanical and electrical design, simplicity of adjustment, ruggedness, sensitivity, sharpness of tuning, wave length range and faithfulness of reproduction in radio telephone reception.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Preparation for the Coming of Christ.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Place and Work of John the Baptist.

We are today entering upon a six months' course of study in the Gospel of Luke, whose general subject is "Jesus the World's Savior." Today's lesson concerns the birth of John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ.

I. The Parents of John the Baptist (vv. 5-7).

1. When They Lived (v. 5). "In the days of Herod the King." They lived in a day when ungodliness was rife. The priesthood was very corrupt and the ruling classes were wicked. Zacharias and his wife lived in a time when it was not so easy to be godly.

2. Their Character (v. 6). They were righteous before God. To be righteous before God is a high tribute. Many appear to be righteous before men who are not righteous before God. Their lives were so mated that they walked in the commandments of the Lord blameless. How beautiful it is when husband and wife are united in the Lord and walk together in fellowship with God.

3. They Were Childless (v. 7). Though this godly couple were well mated and they possessed the joy of the Lord in their souls, there was a real lack in that home.

II. The Birth of John Promised (vv. 8-17).

1. By Whom (v. 11; cf. v. 19). The angel Gabriel appeared and made known the good news to Zacharias. This exalted being, the special messenger of God, was sent to make this disclosure.

2. When (vv. 8-14). While officiating as priest this good news came to him. Zacharias must have been definitely praying about this very matter (v. 13). As he burned incense, which typified prayer, the multitude without were praying.

3. Characteristics of the Child (vv. 15-17). (1) Shall be great in the sight of the Lord (v. 15). Though the people did not greatly esteem him he was highly esteemed by the Lord. This is infinitely better than if he had been greatly esteemed in the eyes of men or in his own eyes. This is the esteem for which we all should long and pray. (2) Shall drink neither wine nor strong drink (v. 15). The child shall become a Nazarite, separating himself from the sensuous things and dedicating himself to the service of the Lord. (3) Be filled with the Holy Ghost (v. 15). The energy of the divine Spirit would enable him to lead the people to repentance (v. 16). (4) Shall go in the spirit and power of Elijah (v. 17). In this power he was to prepare the people for the coming of the Savior and the salvation which He was to bring.

III. Zacharias Asking for a Sign (vv. 18-23).

Although the aged priest was earnestly praying for the salvation of Israel the gracious promise of the angel, which was the beginning of that salvation, staggered his faith. He was unable to believe that that for which he fondly hoped and prayed would be realized. The angel gave Zacharias a sign. He was smitten with dumbness which was to continue until the fulfillment of the promise. Because he refused to praise God in faith for this gracious promise God caused his tongue to be silent until the promise was fulfilled and his lips could open in thanksgiving and praise. Though he was thus rebuked, at the same time his faith was strengthened by the manifestation of the supernatural. God wants us to trust Him, to believe His promises, no matter how contrary to reason they may seem.

IV. The Promise Fulfilled (vv. 57-[illegible]).

When the time came for the birth of John, Elizabeth brought forth a son and the neighbors rejoiced with her. On the eighth day they circumcized the child and gave him a name according to the instruction of the angel [illegible]

Why the Umbrellas?

A rather amusing sight was that at York beach one rainy day recently, when a party of bathers all ready for the morning dip came from their cottages on their way to the beach all carrying open umbrellas. Vacationists witnessing the procession of bathers approaching the water all set for the plunge, wondered at the theory of carrying "bumbleshoots" to protect themselves from the rain when they would shortly be drenched while taking their morning bath.—New York Sun

FREEDOM FROM LAXATIVES

Discovery by Scientists Has Replaced Them.

Pills and salts give temporary relief from constipation only at the expense of permanent injury, says an eminent medical authority.

Science has found a newer, better way—a means as simple as Nature itself.

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft and moving. But when constipation exists this natural lubricant is not sufficient. Medical authorities have found that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. It is in no sense a medicine. And like pure water it is harmless and pleasant.

Nujol is prescribed by physicians; used in leading hospitals. Get a bottle from your druggist today.—Advertisement.

Busy Masculine Knitters.

Knitting isn't exclusively a woman's work or pastime or art. In every fire engine house throughout the District the fire laddies are busily engaged in making fancy sweaters of intricate design for wives or sweethearts. In one of the most popular art needlework shops in Washington there is a man instructor in knitting, who can work all sorts of pictures into the mesh that glides through his fingers. One of the most prominent men in the Carnegie institution has been a knitting artist for years and makes elaborate bedspreads, dresses, draperies.—Washington Star.

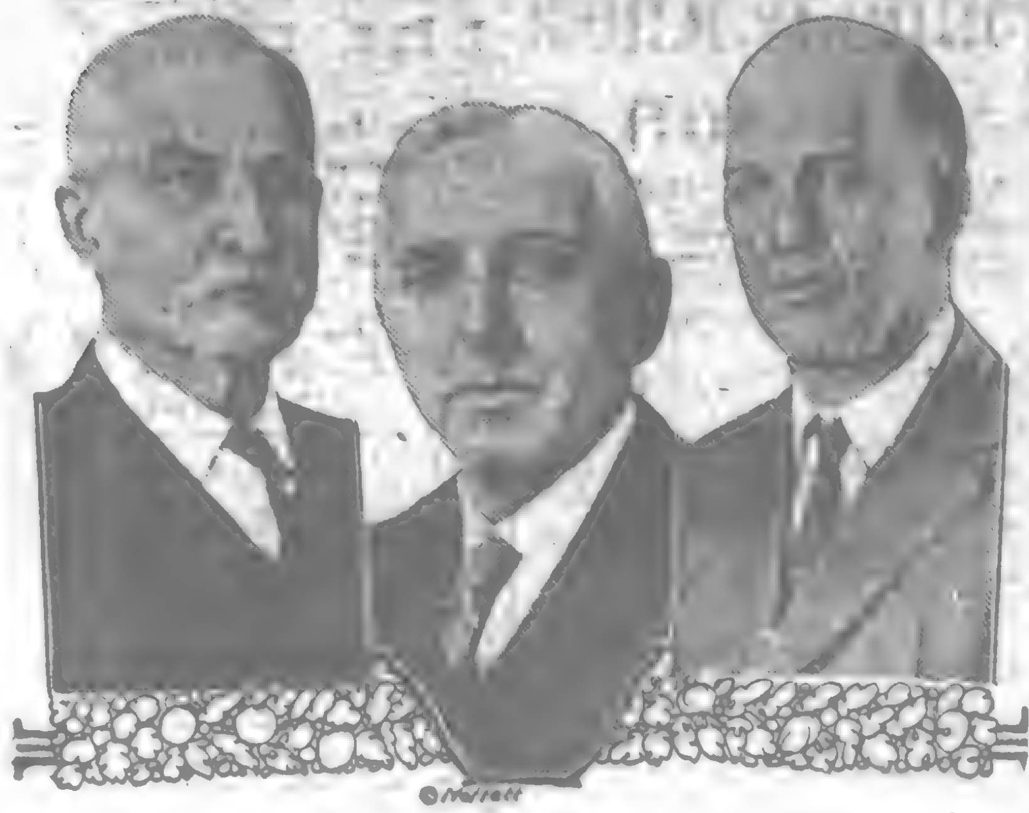
American Farm Bureau



J. F. Reed of Minnesota. R. A. Cowles of Illinois.
E. H. Cunningham of Iowa, President.

The U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., the largest co-operative marketing attempt by farmers, has been completely reorganized with the Mid-west farm bureaus in control.

An election of a new board of directors was the first formal step in reorganization. The new board elected the following officers:

President, E. H. Cunningham; vice-president, H. L. Keefe; secretary, J. M. Mehl; treasurer, Chas. E. Gunnels.

Secretary Mehl has been assistant to the president of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., since its incorporation. Mr. Gunnels is treasurer of the American Farm Bureau federation and is permitted by that organization to serve the grain growers without pay.

From the board of directors an executive committee of three was elected—E. H. Cunningham, R. A. Cowles and J. F. Reed—and vested in it broad powers for carrying on the affairs of the organization. The subsidiary U. S. Grain Growers' Sales company is controlled by this executive committee.

An advisory executive committee of three was appointed to advise on questions of finance and marketing. The members of this committee are: Bernard M. Baruch, financier, New York; Alexander Legge, president of International Harvester company, Chicago; Frank O. Wetmore, president of First National bank, Chicago. All three have accepted appointment on this committee.

Secretary of Agriculture Henry C. Wallace and Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover were invited to serve as ex-officio members of the new board of directors, representing the public.

Reorganization Effected.

The reorganization of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., was effected through the recommendations of the Mid-west farm bureau creditors' committee. This committee consists of E. H. Cunningham, secretary of the Iowa Farm Bureau federation; W. S. Hill, president of the South Dakota Farm Bureau federation, and J. W. Coverdale, secretary of the American Farm Bureau federation. It was authorized on May 18 in a conference of the Mid-west farm bureau presidents and secretaries and has been at work ever since untangling the affairs of the farmers' co-operative grain marketing organization as disclosed in the first annual meeting in Chicago on March 31. The creditors' committee holds powers of attorney for most of the creditors who have claims against the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc. The plan for reorganization was worked out by the creditors' committee and submitted to a meeting of the Mid-west farm bureau presidents and secretaries in the office of the American Farm Bureau federation August 3. The recommendations of the committee were unanimously adopted.

E. H. Cunningham, president of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., issues the following statement regarding the affairs of the co-operative grain marketing association:

"The U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., involves the supreme effort of the American farmer to follow his own product closer to the ultimate consumer. The movement was born of the highest-minded sincerity on the part of the grain farmer, necessity forcing him to seek improved methods of marketing the product of his toil. As the new management comes into control of the U. S. Grain Growers, Inc., we have no Utopian schemes to propose, no visionary plans to work out. We recognize certain economic laws which cannot be flouted, and certain business principles which cannot be ignored without inviting disaster. We have no fight against existing agencies and methods. But we do believe most sincerely that the men who grow grain have the right to sell what they produce.

Selling Agency Planned.

"And we plan to [illegible] a producers' selling agency, which [illegible] function in strict [illegible] with sound business methods of procedure. We do not expect to establish any great and spectacular reforms while the farmer waits. We hold out no flattering promises to producers that we will be able to reach out into space and get 25, 40 or 50 cents a bushel more for their grain than the market justifies. Our grower members must recognize that fact in the beginning, and they will be called upon to exercise patience, as well as co-operation.

"We will do our best to rehabilitate the organization upon sound business principles. We are not fooling ourselves, and we are not going to attempt to fool anybody else. At the proper time, after we have gathered up the loose ends, we shall make a full and frank statement to the public. We propose to start upon a modest scale that will insure financial solvency, and to grow and expand as experience leads and business conditions justify."

Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Association Selects Well-Known Farmer and Business Man.

The Texas Farm Bureau Cotton association has elected J. W. L. Hall, a well-known Texas farmer, banker and business man, secretary for the ensuing year. Enthusiastic approval was given plans for a state-wide campaign to double the membership. BETTER ROADS

SAFE WIDTH OF HARD ROADS

Bureau of Public Roads Makes Recommendation of 18 Feet to Provide Good Clearance.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A minimum width of 18 feet for hard-surface roads is recommended by the bureau of public roads, of the United States Department of Agriculture. The maximum width of truck body generally permitted is 8 feet, and 5½ feet is the ordinary clearance width of automobiles. At an average speed of 30 miles an hour it is unreasonable to expect the driver of an automobile to drive with the wheels closer than 1½ feet to the edge of the pavement, says the bureau. For trucks at an average speed of 15 miles an hour, this distance should not be less than 1¾ feet on account of the great width of the rear wheel. Three feet seems to be a minimum safe clearance between bodies. Inasmuch as a certain amount of truck traffic is to be expected on all main country roads, the minimum width of surface should be 18 feet to provide these clearances when an automobile meets a truck.

Traffic on a 18-Foot Pavement.

Where the frequency with which trucks pass each other becomes a big factor, as in the neighborhood of large cities, the minimum width of pavement should be 20 feet to provide a clearance of 3½ feet and a safe distance of wheels from edge of pavement.

GRAVEL FOR ROAD BUILDING

Simple, Portable Apparatus Devised to Test Its Suitability for Highways.

To aid the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, in giving particular attention to the use of local material for road construction wherever possible, a sample portable apparatus has been devised for testing gravel to determine its suitability for concrete. The device consists of two steel balls arranged so that a piece of gravel can be placed on top of one of the balls and the other ball allowed to fall from different heights and strike the gravel. The height of fall required to break the gravel is an indication of its suitability to withstand the blows of traffic.

Heretofore there has been no satisfactory test of gravel as there has been for stone, with the result that in some instances more costly material has been used when a suitable gravel was available close at hand. Along this line the bureau is conducting wear tests on concrete made of many different materials to determine just how far it is safe to go when the quality of material is doubtful.

MONEY FOR COLORADO ROADS

Secretary Wallace Approves Expenditure of $586,000 for Highways in Forest.

Expenditures totaling $586,000 of national forest highway funds for the construction of 106 miles of roads in Colorado have been approved by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace. This money was made available for roads of primary importance to the state, counties or communities within, adjoining or adjacent to the national forests.

CASSOWARY BIRD WAYS

"Yes," said the Cassowary, "it is true that I am a curious looking bird. In fact you might not even call me a bird when you first looked at me for I'm walking about the ground and I'm not flying above the ground.

"But I am a bird just as the Ostrich family and others are birds, though they are to be seen on the ground, and not flying about in the air.

"I have been here in the zoo quite a while and I get along very well.

"I ate some sand just now, which surprised one of the visitors. But I often eat sand. In fact, I enjoy a certain amount of sand in my food. Just as I have heard some people say that they like to have their food seasoned with salt so does the cassowary like to eat a certain amount of sand.

"Just what that amount is I couldn't tell you. I never measured the amount of sand I ate. But, then, I don't suppose people measure the amount of salt they eat, so that is fair enough.

"My home used to be in an island known as the Cassowary island. An excellent name it was for the island, too.

"That island is one of the islands of New Britain, east of New Guinea.

"I couldn't point that out to you on the map, but that is where they say I came from, so I suppose they know.

"Anyway, there were lots of cassowaries in the home island, and there is only one other here. That is a young cassowary.

"You'll see him down yonder. He is only eighteen months old. He wasn't born here, but was brought here as a young cassowary child.

"Cassowaries aren't born in the zoo. It is enough of an honor to a zoo that they will be brought here and will lend interest to the zoo by their presence.

"A bit conceited, eh? Well, now and again I feel a little superior and a little like showing that I'm not going to be taken advantage of—I'm not.

"My home was in a great, thick jungle. Doesn't that sound interesting? There we lived in the wonderful underbrush.

"You will notice that I have a horny, hard kind of a helmet upon my head?

"It protects our heads from injury or harm, as we go through the underbrush.

"Our helmets never grow out of fashion. We're not like people in that way who're always changing hats with the styles.

"And people's hats look shabby after a bit or faded by the sun. But not our helmets. Oh, no, we have helmets worth having.

"Neighbor Curassow Is Much Smaller."

"But, of course, the great advantage about them is that they're of so much protection to us.

"We like lettuce and bread and fruit and bananas in the way of food.

"We do not care for meat.

"Now, sometimes Neighbor Curassow will eat a little meat. But we never will.

"Neighbor Curassow is much smaller than I am. Do you like his red beak?

"Of course one can't expect so much of a smaller creature, and so, you see, he hasn't the sense to keep to a little fruit and vegetable diet as I do.

"But, then, people eat meat, don't they. Well, I must be careful what I say, then, about meat eating.

"The young curassow, over there, a real little zoo curassow, is wilder than those who were [illegible] here from their own [illegible] [illegible].

"The ones who were [illegible] here are [illegible] quite tame.

Fight Over Latin and Greek.

A bitter war is being waged in the French parliament over the retention of Latin and Greek as compulsory studies in French colleges. Socialists and others with modern ideas want to abolish them and give more attention to manual training and industrial subjects. Catholics and conservatives in general see great danger to the state in abandoning the study of the languages from which French was derived. America was cited as having brought studies up to date, but the reply was made that even in America a certificate as expert wood chopper would not help in matriculation.

NOAH'S ARK WAS ONLY A PYRAMID

This Is Theory of Doctor Getsinger Based on Years of Study and Exploration.

CHEOPS WAS NOT THE BUILDER

Animals That Went Into Ark Were Not Material but Spiritual Animals, the Animals of the Zodiac, Aries, Taurus, Etc.

Los Angeles.—Noah's Ark, built to save the human race from the flood of ancient Bible times, is still extant for all to see after 80,000 years.

This is the belief of Dr. C. E. Getsinger, Egyptologist, now visiting Los Angeles.

Doctor Getsinger's conclusion is based upon recent discoveries following 35 years' research work and intensive study. He declares that the Ark of Noah was not a ship. It was the great pyramid of Cheops in Egypt.

Recent discoveries prove that the pyramids—Noah's Ark and the others —were under the sea for thousands of years. Near the top of each of the pyramids, at the same level, is a highwater line, where a deep niche has been cut into the rock by the lashing of a long-forgotten surf. Also, the inner passages of the pyramids are thickly crusted with salt, which a chemical analysis proves to be sea salt.

Doctor Getsinger is convinced that these monuments were built thousands of years before Cheops, to whom they have been accredited. Cheops merely repaired them and caused a casing of stones to be built over them.

Mystery of the Pyramids.

And he is convinced that the pyramid stands today a living monument to an old and noble philosophy, a greater civilization than any we have since attained. That great pyramid which, together with the sphinx and the nine smaller pyramids, have for centuries exercised the wonder and astonishment of scientists, who have frankly admitted that they could not have been built upon any known possible conditions, and that we have even today no means by which the immense stones used in the construction could be transported and adjusted into their present position.

In the great pyramid there are three chambers which conform to God's directions to Noah for the building of the Ark against the coming of the great flood—"with lower, second and third stories shalt thou make it."

And these three chambers, named for the three sons of Noah, Shem, Ham and Japhet, Doctor Getsinger thinks are intended to represent the three stratas of human life and intelligence. The chamber of Shem, the lower, symbolizes the animals who have no souls. The second chamber, Ham, symbolizes human beings with souls, but of lesser intellectual and spiritual attainment. And the highest chamber, that of Japhet, symbolizes the inspired teachers—the spiritual intellectuals, souls of greater understanding.

Spiritual Animals.

The entrance which is 52 feet above the ground, Doctor Getsinger declares, was so placed that the North Star, the polar star, could shine directly into the interior from the Heavens—which it did 80,000 years ago, and after a complete cycle, so shines again today.

This Egyptologist thinks that the animals that went into the Ark were not material animals but spiritual animals, the animals of the Zodiac—Aries, the Ram; Taurus, the Bull; Cancer, the Crab; Leo, the Lion; Scorpio, the Scorpion (insects); Capricornus, the Goat; Pisces, the Fish, together with II. Gemini, the Twins; Virgo, the Virgin; Libra, the Balance; Sagittarius, the Archer, and Aquarius, the Water-Bearer.

The great flood of Noah's day did not submerge the whole of the present known world, but included only the ancient lost continent of Atlantis and Egypt. Atlantis has never reappeared, but Egypt, after 12,000 years under the sea, was [illegible] by immigrants from other lands, together with their animals.

HELICOPTER SUCCESS, CLAIM

Inventor Brennan Aided by Government Perfects Plane Said to Rise Vertically.

London, England.—A successful helicopter, dream of aviation experimenters for years, has been devised by Louis Brennan, with the aid of the British government, according to the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. Brennan is the inventor of the Brennan torpedo and the gyroscopic monorail.

It is claimed the new helicopter can rise from and land on a small roof, hover stationary in the air, rise to a height of 2,000 feet and fly sixty miles an hour. All these requirements were to have been fixed by the British air ministry, which was preparing to offer for their fulfillment a prize of £50,000.

The newspaper predicts that the helicopter will bring flying into everyday business and social life and adds: "For military purposes its ability to hover stationary over a given spot gives it almost incalculable value. It has, moreover, the quality of virtual invisibility owing to the blurred appearance of the rotating surfaces which keep it suspended in the air."

Woman's Love Fails to Lift.

Denver, Colo.—John Randolph, thief, whose wife said she was formerly Miss Elizabeth Calhoun, a graduate of the University of Chicago and daughter of Mrs. C. W. Dawson, wealthy resident of Kankakee, Ill., was sentenced the other day by District Judge Butler to serve from five to nine years in the penitentiary. Mrs. Randolph declared she married Randolph to reform him after her mother, Mrs. Dawson, had secured his release from the Missouri state penitentiary.

The Mardi Gras Mystery

"Very well. Do not plan to wear any jewels, Lucie. I have a set to lend you for the occasion—no, not a gift, merely a loan for the sake of Comus. They are very nice pearls—a little old fashioned, because they were mounted for the Princess de Lamballe, but you will find that they fit in excellently with your gown. I'll bring them with me when I call for you—"

"And I'll render fitting thanks then. One thing more: Henry Gramont is going to see you after luncheon, I think—on business. And I want you to be nice to him, Uncle Jachin."

"Most assuredly," said the other, dryly. "I should like to be associated in business with that young man. The firm would prosper."

Smiling, she hung up the receiver.

Ten minutes later, when Gramont and Miss Ledanois entered the waiting car, Hammond saw the boxes that they carried. He stood beside the open door, paralyzed, his eyes fastened on the boxes, his mouth agape.

"To the post office, sergeant," said Gramont, then affected to observe his stupefaction. "Why, what's the matter?"

Hammond met his twinkling eyes, saw the laughter of Lucie, and swallowed hard.

"I—er—nothing at all, cap'n," he answered, hoarsely. "A—little chokin' spell, that's all. Post office? Yes, sir."

CHAPTER VIII.

Comus.

From the time they left the Ledanois house with Lucie, Gramont had no opportunity of seeing his chauffeur in private until, later in the afternoon, he left the Maison Blanche building. He had enjoyed a thoroughly satisfactory interview with Jachin Fell. The car was waiting for him in Royal street, not far from the Monteleone, and Gramont approached it to find Hammond in deep worry over the outcome of the interview with Fell.

"Well, cap'n!" he exclaimed, anxiously, as Gramont drew up. "You're smilin', so I guess it ain't a pinch!"

"Don't worry. The stuff is returned, and the matter is now closed. We can forget all about the Midnight Masquer. Now, there's another and more important thing that I want to speak with you about, a matter of business—"

"Hold on, cap'n!" interrupted Hammond, quietly, his eye on a spot behind Gramont. "One of your friends is headed over this way, and if I know anything about it, he's got blood in his eye."

Gramont turned, to see Bob Maillard approaching. The latter addressed him without any response to his greeting.

"Have you a moment to spare, Gramont?"

"All afternoon," answered Gramont, cheerfully. He affected not to observe Maillard's air of heavy business, nor the frowning suspicion that lurked half-veiled in the other's glowering features.

The two were standing a bit apart, and Hammond was fussing with one of the headlights, but Gramont suspected that the chauffeur was listening avidly. "I've just come from a talk with dad. How did it happen that you sold him that stock of yours in the company?"

Gramont smiled a little. "I happened to need the money. Why?"

"But why the devil didn't you hang on to that stock? Or if you needed money, why didn't you come to me?" exploded the other, angrily.

"Heavens!" drawled Gramont, who was quite willing to exasperate young Maillard to the limit. "You seem frightfully concerned about it! What's the big idea, anyway? I offered the stock to your father at a discount. He realized that it was a good buy, and took it. What's wrong with that?"

"Nothing wrong, if you put it that way," snapped Maillard, angrily. "But it's a confounded sly way of doing things—"

"Now, just wait right there!" Gramont's easy smile vanished. "I don't take that kind of talk, Maillard. I'm off in the morning to start work on that report I was engaged to make. When the report comes in, my resignation comes with it."

"All right. Let it come here and [illegible] cern to which you persuaded your precious father to sell some of Miss Ledanois' Bayou land? Remember the real estate company to which you persuaded him to sell her St. Landry parish property? You had interests in both concerns; I don't imagine you'd care to have your share in those transactions exposed. Further, I entirely understand your indignation over my getting rid of this stock before the crash, and it ill becomes you to assume any such attitude."

[illegible]

Maillard glared at him for a long moment, a red tide of rage flooding and ebbing from his heavy countenance. Then, mastering himself, he turned away without further speech.

Leaving Hammond to take the car home, Gramont headed for Canal street to mingle with the carnival crowd and revel in his new-found sense of freedom. Now that he was his own master, he felt like a new man. With a boyish abandon, he tramped the streets merrily, exchanging jests and confetti, shoves and bladder-blows, laughs and kisses. Madness and reckless gayety were in the very air, and Gramont drank deep of these youthful tonics. When at last he wandered home to his pension, he was footsore, weary, disarranged and tousled—and very happy. The wine of human comradeship is a good wine.

That evening the Comus ball, the most exclusive revel of the most exclusive aristocracy of the southland, crowded the edifice in which it was held to capacity. Here evening dress was prescribed for all the guests. The Krewe of Comus alone were masked and costumed, in grotesque and magnificent costumes which had been in the making for months. The Krewe is to the South what the Bohemian club is to the western coast, with the added enhancement of mystery.

Despite the revels of the Krewe, however—despite the glittering jewels, the barbaric costumes, the music, the excitement—an indefinable air of regret, almost of sadness, pervaded the entire gathering. This feeling was something to be sensed, rather than observed definitely. Some said, afterward, that it was a premonition of the terrible event that was to happen this night. Wrong! It was because, for the first time in many generations, the Comus ball was held in one of the newer public buildings instead of in its accustomed place. Everyone was speaking of it. Even Maillard the banker, that cold man of dollars, spoke uneasily of it when Gramont encountered him in the smoking room.

"It doesn't seem like Comus," said Maillard, with a vexed frown. "And to think that we had just finished redecorating the opera house when it was burned down! Comus will never be the same again."

"I didn't know you could feel such emotion for a ruined building, Maillard," said Gramont, lightly. The banker shrugged a trifle.

"Emotion? No. Regret! None of us, who has been brought up in the traditions of the [illegible] pair for Mardi Gras. It was itself—a landmark. Nothing else would ever be like it.

From his seat in the Lavergne box Gramont contented himself during the early evening with the common role of all the "blackcoats"—that of looking on idly. More than once he saw Lucie Ledanois called out, among others of the fair sex, as a dancing partner for some member of the Krewe. None of the male guests, however, was allowed to participate in the festivity until Rex and his queen should arrive—at midnight; thus, Gramont saw almost nothing of Lucie during the evening.

While in search of smoking companions, Gramont encountered many of his acquaintances, and among them Doctor Ansley and Jachin Fell. The three strolled off together into one of the unused passages leading to other parts of the building. They opened a window and stood watching the crowd that surged in the street below, constantly increasing as the hour grew later, for the procession of Rex would be well worth seeing and nobody meant to miss anything upon this night of nights.

Suddenly, at the sound of an approaching footstep, the three men turned. The electric lights were going in all of the hallways, and they perceived that the individual approaching them was a member of the Krewe of Comus. He was also, it became evident, giving a share of his allegiance to Bacchus, for his feet were obviously unsteady. He was clad in a parti-colored costume, which was crowned by an exaggerated head of Mephisto.

"Wonderin' who I am, aren't you?" he hiccuped. "Well, don't wonder; 'sall between ol' friends tonight. Tell you what, m' friends—come with me and I'll find you a li'l drink, eh? Real old Boone pinchneck—got it from some boys in Louisville, been savin' it up for tonight."

He wagged his head at them, and pursued his subject in a half-maudlin burst of confidential assurance.

"Havin' a little party in one of the rooms," he continued. "All of us friends—lots more fun than dancin'! And say! I'm going pull something great, positively great; you don't want to miss it, gentlemen! You come along with me and I'll fix it for you. Come on, Gramont, that's a good fellow! You'n I had a dis'greement today—don't matter tonight, nothin' matters tonight, nothin' at all. Mardi Gras only comes once a year, eh? Come along, now."

Jachin Fell very civilly refused the invitation, as did the others. Gramont, who now recognized their accoster, was less civil in his refusal. Mephisto regarded them with vinous regret.

"No 'joyment in you, any more? Better come along. Tell you, I've got the biggest joke of the season ready to pull off—something rich! Gramont, come on!"

"Thanks, no," responded Gramont curtly.

The masquer gave up the struggle and moved on down the empty hallway.

"I wonder who that was, now?" mused Doctor Ansley, frowning. "Evidently someone who knew us; at least, he recognized you, Gramont."

"So it seemed," put in Jachin Fell. His tone, like his eyes, had a somber fire. "A party of them drinking, eh? That will make trouble. The Krewe won't like it. Who was he, Gramont? Sounded like—"

"Young Maillard." At Gramont's response a whistle broke from Doctor Ansley. Jachin Fell nodded assent.

"You took the words out of my mouth. So Bob is drinking again, eh? Hello, Gramont—where to?"

Gramont tossed his cigar through the open window.

"I think I'll make my adieux, Fell. I intend to be up early in the morning and get off to work—"

"What?" protested Ansley in astonishment. "You must stay until Rex comes, at least! Why, that's the event of the carnival! The evening hasn't started yet."

"I'm growing old and sober, doctor," [illegible]

Short Jackets Have the Call

Some of the most notable successes among clothes have had as their basis a simple idea which must have occurred time and again to women all over the world, but we have become so accustomed to waiting for the mandates of fashion to come from fashion authorities that few women have the temerity to create models, or if they do create them they are afraid to wear their own creations, says a fashion writer in the New York Tribune. We have learned to wait for the cachet of some great maker to appear on a model before we accept it.

Almost every woman has felt the need of some sort of informal jacket on the order of a sweater to wear over lightweight, short-sleeved dresses. There was nothing that filled this need, especially for the summer. Most of the smart sweaters have, for the last few years, been made to slip on over the head, which practically made it necessary to arrange or rearrange the hair after the garment was put on.

Jackets Replace Coat Sweaters.

Then the sweater is such a close-fitting garment that it crushes the frock; consequently, it is hopeless as a jacket to wear over anything but a plain blouse where only the collars and cuffs show by being turned back over the sweater neck and sleeves. Then, too, the summer sweater usually is so thin that the ugly line of a short-sleeved dress shows half-way down the sleeve of the sweater.

Practically every woman knew that some sort of jacket was needed in place of the old-fashioned loose coat-sweater that did such good service in bygone years, but she waited patiently for the great designers in Paris to launch this idea. Her patience was rewarded by the clocki coats.

It may have been that there was no material sufficiently inspiring to the mind of the designer until Rodier brought out his fabrics in blistered effects. This would look like a reasonable supposition, since the various creators of clothes selected clocki almost simultaneously for the short separate jackets which they succeeded in popularizing almost over night, for the demand for these jackets is very great. It is not to be supposed that any one with any imaginative genius would stop with one sort of material for a new type of coat, so they have gone on from this material to others.

Two-Tier Pockets on Model.

Notable among some late models in the short separate coat is one in white satin clocki, trimmed with a border of black satin poppy petals loosely applied. This jacket is smart when worn with a black crepe marocain skirt and a black outdoor hat. It makes a most distinguished costume, and one which will be eagerly seized upon by the woman who is desirous of getting away from the set type of sweater and skirt and sweater and overblouse so universally worn.

Madame Jenny, who so successfully caters to the well-dressed American, arate coat as exploited in the fashions of the moment. The black background sets off to excellent advantage multi-colored embroidery on the sleeves, collar and pockets.

The Suit That Is Knitted of Beige and Brown Wool.

One would naturally expect that something more practical in material, but similar in cut, should follow in the wake of these glorified outing jackets because, when a fashion suddenly flames up almost over night, as it were, and takes such a tremendous hold on the public in general it has somewhere in its composition some of the qualities which make a best seller, and no progressive dressmaker or manufacturer is going to relinquish such a profitable garment until every idea that it contains has been exploited to the utmost. So for the autumn these magnificent coats will be followed by more practical ones of wool, many of them knitted after the fashion of the old-time sweater-coat.

Rabbit Competes With Monkey's Pelt.

Several great dressmakers have gone still further with this idea and have made skirts to match these jackets, especially in the wool things. Worth has a model with the jacket knitted in wool in plaid effect—gray, white and black. The shawl collar on the jacket and the cuffs and girdle are of gray.

Molyneux shows a knitted jacket in white wool with pipings, buttons and belt of red leather. With this may be worn either a red or white wool skirt. Another interesting jacket is of black and rust-colored wool in chine effect, with a trimming of black cire braid and a belt of black suede.

Among the most luxurious of the short coats are those of India cashmere trimmed with fur. Frequently the fur is monkey skin. There is a vogue for rabbit dyed to represent squirrel, chinchilla and kolinsky on short coats.

At the beginning of a new season the seemingly small details of dress play an important part. Vital questions, such as the silhouette, are not definitely settled. So many ideas are afloat as an aftermath of the French openings that it is unwise to choose such an important thing as a suit or a dress without a good deal of careful consideration, so women depend on those things known as the accessories of dress to give newness to their costumes.

Now one may freshen one's wardrobe by buying new collars and girdles, or perhaps a few bits of the costume jewelry which is in fashion's limelight at the present time.

There are any number of new collars, both of lingerie and of ribbon, which are made to fit the various shapes of necklines in favor. Many of these are so unusual that a last season's dress or suit jacket may be [illegible]

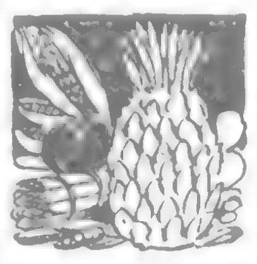
DO YOU LIKE PINEAPPLE?

Pineapple like other fruits are never better than when served and eaten fresh. But we are glad to have a few cans during the season when they are not on the market, to help out in the variety of our [illegible]. As a salad or in combination with [illegible] foods, pineapple adds much to a dish. A cabbage salad becomes a dish in the highest class with a slice or two of pineapple added to it.



Pineapple Cake.—Make [illegible] food or any white cake baked in a sheet. Cut and put together in layers with a filling of whipped cream into which has been stirred shredded pineapple, sugar and flavoring to taste. The cake may be baked in layers or made into small cakes.

Pineapple Salad.—Arrange a slice of pineapple on lettuce, and on the slices place pieces of red pepper cut in the form of poinsetta petals. Riced hard-cooked egg may be used for the centers.

Pineapple Dessert.—Arrange on individual plates as many slices of pineapple. In the center of each slice place a cone of ice cream and sprinkle with chopped nuts. Whipped cream may be added to the cone, then the chopped nuts.

Pineapple Marshmallow.—Mix equal amounts of marshmallows cut in quarters and pineapple cut in cubes; add pineapple juice and let the mixture stand for a while in a cool place. Just before serving, add a half-cupful of sweetened and flavored whipped cream and a few almonds. Serve in sherbet cups garnished with cherries.

Frozen Pudding.—Make a custard of a pint of milk, three egg yolks, a cupful of sugar and a pinch of salt; strain, add a teaspoonful of vanilla and almond mixed, then fold in the whites of the eggs and a cupful of whipped cream. Add chopped pineapple and candied cherries finely minced and freeze as usual.

Pineapple Fritters. — Stir grated pineapple into fritter batter, using one cupful of flour, one-half teaspoonful of baking powder, a pinch of salt, two well-beaten eggs, one-half cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of milk. Beat well. Use a cupful of pineapple. Fry in small spoonfuls in deep fat.

Pineapple With Cheese.—Place a slice of pineapple in the center of head lettuce. In the center of the slice put a ball of seasoned cream cheese, sprinkle with a little of the riced yolk of egg.

EVERYDAY FOOD

A tasty pudding which is quickly prepared and so good for the small people is apple bread pudding. Cut pieces of bread into two-inch squares or smaller, spread with butter and put into a baking dish with a generous cupful of thinly sliced apple sweetened and flavored. Bake until the apple is done. Serve hot with sugar and cream.

Salmon Croquettes.—Mix a cupful of canned salmon with an equal quantity of cold mashed potato. Bind with beaten egg or a very thick cream sauce. Shape into croquettes, dip in crumbs and egg and fry in a wire basket in deep fat.

Codfish and Macaroni.—Take one cupful each of cooked macaroni and flaked cooked codfish. Put into a buttered baking dish, sprinkle with salt, pepper and crumbs—the crumbs well buttered. Sprinkle with grated cheese and add sufficient milk to moisten. Bake until brown in a hot oven.

Cuban Codfish.—Chop one onion fine and fry a light brown in butter. Add a cupful of canned tomatoes and a cupful of freshened codfish. Cook ten minutes, stirring constantly. Serve on buttered toast.

Pea and Walnut Salad.—Take equal quantities of green cooked peas and walnut meats broken into bits. Sprinkle with French dressing and let stand half an hour. Serve with mayonnaise on lettuce or in lemon cups.

Jellied Fish.—Soak one package of [illegible] in cold water to cover, then add enough water to make a cupful [illegible]

Rheumatism and Dyspepsia Are Soon Ended

Victims of stomach trouble and rheumatism often find that when their stomach is set in order, the rheumatism disappears. Thousands of people everywhere have testified that Tanlac has freed them of both troubles simultaneously. Mr. Robert Trotter, 148 State St., St. Paul, Minn., says:

"About a year ago I began to go down hill. Sour stomach and rheumatism in my arms and shoulders kept me in misery all the time. Since taking Tanlac all my aches and pains have gone, and my stomach is in fine shape. I'm glad to endorse such a fine medicine."

Badly digested food fills the whole system with poisons. Rheumatism and many other complaints not generally recognized as having their origin in the stomach quickly respond to the right treatment. Get a bottle today at any good druggist.—Advertisement.

A Hard Luck Record.

Richard Luze, driving his car to town, skidded into a telephone pole. Coming back with the garage man to clear up the wreck he found thieves had stripped it of tires and fixtures. Walking home in the rain two highwaymen with howitzers took all his cash, a watch and his package of plug-cut away from him. Finally reaching home Luze discovered lightning had struck the barn killing a $250 Missouri mule and that the hired man had lit out with the family savings amounting to $140. This made Luze a loser five times in one day.—Capper's Weekly.

MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS

Read This Letter from Mrs. W. S. Hughes

Greenville, Del.—"I was under the impression that my eldest daughter had some internal trouble as ever since the first time her sickness appeared she had to go to bed and even had to quit school once for a week. I always take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound myself so I gave it to her and she has received great benefit from it. You can use this letter for a testimonial if you wish, as I cannot say too much about what your medicine has done for me and for my daughter."—Mrs. WM. S. HUGHES, Greenville, Delaware.

Mothers and oftentimes grandmothers have taken and have learned the value of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. So they recommend the medicine to others.

The best test of any medicine is what it has done for others. For nearly fifty years we have published letters from mothers, daughters, and women, young and old, recommending the Vegetable Compound. They know what it did for them and are glad to tell others. In your own neighborhood are women who know of its great value.

Mothers—daughters, why not try it?

Ancient Costumes in Greenland.

Men's costumes of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth centuries have been found in Greenland. They are in an excellent state of preservation and resemble the clothes worn by Dante in the published pictures of the Italian poet. They are not yet open to public view, but may be exhibited at some future date.

These interesting finds were made by Dr. Noerlund, a Danish [illegible] while excavating in ancient [illegible] grounds in the southwestern part of Greenland. They are the [illegible] specimens in the world of [illegible] worn by men in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth centuries. Being deposited in the frozen earth for about 600 years has preserved them from destruction by moth and age.

Seen and Heard In Indiana

Muncie.—Two thousand visitors from cities in Indiana and from Greenville, O., attended the initiation at Muncie, of nearly 100 candidates into the Order of the Knights of Columbus. About 1,500 men marched in a parade.

Bicknell.—A quarter of a million tons of coal was sent from the Bicknell field to market in 18 working days since the resumption of production. Car shortage has been a constant hindrance to production in this field.

Valparaiso.—Fire of undetermined origin caused a loss of $10,000 on the farm of Ernest Dietlefs, just south of Valparaiso. Two large barns containing 500 bushels of wheat, 1,000 bushels of oats, 50 tons of hay and some farming machinery were destroyed.

Indianapolis.—Fire losses in Indianapolis the first eight months of 1922 are $262,379 less than they were during the same period in 1921, according to a report which the superintendent of the Indianapolis salvage corps has submitted to the citizens' fire prevention committee of the chamber of commerce. The losses include damage to buildings and contents.

Valparaiso.—Possibility of another great steel city, a rival of Gary, is hinted in the action of the Inland Steel company, which has just had surveyed and recorded at Valparaiso two plats of its real estate in Portage township, adjoining the eastern city line of Gary, fronting two miles on Lake Michigan and about a mile and half back into the sand dunes.

Indianapolis.—Representatives of manufacturing concerns in Indiana cities north of here, testifying before P. F. Gault, examiner for the interstate commerce commission, said that they consider Indianapolis rates on coal shipped from the so-called "inner crescent" mining territory to be reasonable. They argued in favor of a revision downward of rates to their cities and asserted that it would accomplish no good to disturb the Indianapolis rates.

Tipton.—Fear that "some Indiana coal handlers are showing a tendency to charge exorbitant prices" was expressed by Gov. Warren T. McCray, at a joint meeting of the Kiwanis clubs of Tipton and Noblesville. The governor said he intended to do everything possible to see that coal reached consumers this winter at a fair price. He said he believed $3.50 a ton at the mines was a fair price, but that the operators have been unwilling to agree on such a basis.

Indianapolis.—The total amount of tax appraised property in Indiana March 1 was about $565,000,000 less than last year, it was set out in an estimate made by the state board of tax commissioners. The board has called on county auditors to provide it with estimates of county valuations. Eighty counties have sent the information. The reports show for the 80 counties a combined valuation of $4,109,278,017. The same counties in 1921 had a combined valuation of $4,561,596,007. The total for the 92 counties last year was $5,701,825,792.

Indianapolis.—The public service commission effected an arrangement with some Indiana railroads whereby the roads will transport material for state road construction projects in coal cars that are being returned empty to mines, the chairman of the highway commission said. Some of the highway construction work has been hampered because open top cars were being used exclusively for coal. The highway department obtained the aid of the public service commission in inducing the railroads to use returning empty cars for sand, gravel and rock transportation.

Washington, D. C.—Derailment of an express train on the Michigan Central railroad, near Gary, Ind., August 20, which resulted in the death of two railroad employees and injury of two passengers, was caused by "malicious tampering with the track," according to a report issued by the bureau of safety of the interstate commerce commission. Careful examination of the track after the accident, the report said, showed it to be in good condition, while no defects were found in the wheels and axles of the derailed equipment.

Brazil.—James A. Cooper, federal receiver, sold at public auction the property of the Rowland Powers Consolidated Collieries company at Staunton. The holdings, said to be valued at more than [illegible], were bid in by the stockholders for [illegible]. Brazil.—Reporting a frost, G. E. Huffman, a farmer of Putnam county invited the public to his farm to enjoy a "watermelon eat." A concert company from DePauw university provided music, and about 2,000 persons attended.

Columbia City.—Twenty-three members of the Seventy-fourth Indiana Civil war infantry regiment recruited in northern Indiana from June to September, 1862, attended the thirty-eighth annual reunion, held at Columbia City.

Bloomfield.—Approximately 2,000 miners are employed in the Linton-Jasonville-Dugger coal field at Bloomfield when all mines are working at capacity. The number of miners at work now does not exceed 75 or 80 per cent of the number employed prior to the strike.

Richmond.—Standard time will be resumed in Richmond by action of the city council in a special meeting, and public opinion forced the council to rescind an ordinance providing for daylight saving time until October 1. Two efforts to abrogate the ordinance, since it was adopted last May, failed, but merchants, manufacturers and professional men announced that they would ignore its provisions.

Noblesville.—Rev. A. H. Moore, pastor of the First Christian church in this city and chairman of the executive committee of the Indiana Christian Endeavor society, has announced that the next state Endeavor convention will be held at Marion the week of June 19, 1923. Authority was given the committee to select the next meeting place at the convention held in June at South Bend.

Gary.—Additional blast furnaces have been put in operation at Gary works in the last few days, and the Gary sheet metal industry expects to have seven sheet mills, three job mills and one plate mill at work. This is the greatest number of mills in operation for several months, or since the start of the coal miners' and the railroad shopmen's strikes. Ten hot mills are planning to resume operations at the tin mills.

Fort Wayne.—John Rowley, sixty-five, a farmer; his daughter, Georgiana, twenty-four, and a guest, Miss Ella Carroll, were killed when an automobile in which they were riding was struck by a train at a crossing six miles north of Fort Wayne. The view of the train was said to be obstructed by a deep cut through which the road approached the right of way. The family was en route to the home of relatives to attend a christening when the accident occurred.

Terre Haute.—Fire of undetermined origin destroyed the plant of the American Hominy company in Terre Haute at a loss estimated at $1,000,000 or more. Nothing of the buildings or machinery of the plant can be salvaged, F. J. Heaslip, manager of the company said. The plant was said to have been the largest cornmeal mill in the world. It was estimated that between 60,000 and 100,000 bushels of corn was burned, but no estimate could be obtained on the amount of meal lost.

Indianapolis.—Governor McCray recently paroled seventeen persons, one a life-term prisoner, and one a Marion county man; commuted the sentences of two; ordered remission of fines for four, two of whom were from Marion county, and refused to grant clemency to thirty-nine, nine of whom are Marion county persons. Ten of the paroled persons had served their sentences, but were "laying out" their fines. The paroles enable them to get out of confinement on condition that they pay their fines in installments as they work.

Indianapolis.—The food and drug division of the state department of health made 2,793 inspections of sanitary conditions at establishments manufacturing and handling food during July, I. L. Miller, director of the division, announced. Of the places inspected, four were rated excellent, 240 poor and 29 bad. Others were good or fair. The four establishments graded excellent included one confectionery, two grocery stores and one restaurant. A total of 113 condemnation notices or orders for improvement were issued against 14 bakeries, 38 cream stations, 15 dairies, 10 groceries, 7 meat markets, 21 restaurants and 9 miscellaneous food plants, Mr. Miller said.

Indianapolis.—Forty miles of new paving in the National road, from Cambridge City to Terre Haute, will be opened to traffic in a short time, John D. [illegible] of the state highway commission, announced. Twenty-two miles of the new hard-surface road construction is between Indianapolis and [illegible], and is part of [illegible] miles of road [illegible] by the commission [illegible]

Some More Truths.

WOULD you use a steam shovel to move a pebble? Certainly not. Implements are built according to the work they have to do.

Would you use a grown-up's remedy for your baby's ills? Certainly not. Remedies are prepared according to the work THEY have to do.

All this is preliminary to reminding you that Fletcher's Castoria was sought out, found and is prepared solely as a remedy for Infants and Children. And let this be a warning against Substitutes, Counterfeits and the Just-as-good stuff that may be all right for you in all your strength, but dangerous for the little babe.

All the mother-love that lies within your heart cries out to you: Be true to Baby. And being true to Baby you will keep in the house remedies specially prepared for babies as you would a baby's food, hairbrush, toothbrush or sponge.

CASTORIA

Are You Prepared?

A doctor in the house all the time would be a good idea. Yet you can't afford to keep a doctor in the family to keep baby well or prevent sickness. But you can do almost the same thing by having at hand a bottle of Fletcher's Castoria, because it is a wonderful remedy for indigestion, colic, feverishness, fretfulness and all the other disorders that result from common ailments that babies have.

Fletcher's Castoria is perfectly safe to use. It is a harmless substitute for Castor Oil, Paregoric, Drops and Soothing Syrups. Children cry for Fletcher's Castoria, and mothers recommend it because they have found it a comfort to children and a mother's friend.

If you love your baby, you know how sweet it is to be able to help baby when trouble comes. You cannot always call upon a doctor. But doctors have nothing but good to say of Fletcher's Castoria, because they know that it can only do good—that it can't do any harm—and they wouldn't want you to use for baby a remedy that you would use for yourself.

WOMEN NEED SWAMP-ROOT

Thousands of women have kidney and bladder trouble and never suspect it.

Women's complaints often prove to be nothing else but kidney trouble, or the result of kidney or bladder disease.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition, they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

Pain in the back, headache, loss of ambition, nervousness, are often times symptoms of kidney trouble.

Don't delay starting treatment. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a physician's prescription, obtained at any drug store, may be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

Get a medium or large size bottle immediately from any drug store.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

MUCH LIKE THE DAYS OF OLD

Skill of Ancient Tournaments Exercised in a Modified Form in Two Southern States.

Ancient tournaments in which mailed knights jousted with lances for the favor of a fair lady, are perpetuated in a modified form among the descendants of the early settlers of Virginia and Maryland. Horseback tournaments with lances are a feature of almost every fair and old home day in the country around Washington.

Instead of driving his lance against his antagonist to unhorse or disable him, the modern knight of the tournament attempts to pick three rings suspended from crosspieces over the course, on the end of his lance, while galloping through the course at a prescribed rate of speed.

If he picks all three, two white clad pages, usually pretty girls, escort him back past the judges' stand. Sometimes a dozen tests are necessary before one knight shows his superiority over the others. He then is permitted to pick the queen of the tournament, who is the belle of the ball, which always follows the event.

Just say to your grocer Red Cross Ball Blue when buying bluing. You will be more than repaid by the results. Once tried always used.—Advertisement.

FRESHMEN:

The following class officers have been elected:

President—Hilda Koch,
Vice President—Robert Morr,
Secretary—Lucille Curie,
Treasurer—Russell Reasoner,
Class Reporter—Walter Brown,
Class Sponser—Roy Maxwell.

You will notice that we are coming to the top in Spelling. We are now ahead of the Seniors and Sophomores and expect to get ahead of the Juniors this week.

Miss Schmalzried dismissed our class last Wednesday morning ten minutes before the usual time. She said she had the sore throat, but we think that she was hungry and couldn't wait until the usual time to go for dinner.

SOPHOMORE:

We notice that the Freshmen are having a class meeting most every day. I guess they think they will have a good time while they can.

For some unknown reason the faculty decided to rearrange the seating plan of the entire high school. We have been moved from the back of the room to the front. We feel that this speaks well for our conduct in the past.

JUNIOR:

We must expose a little vanity by reminding you that the Juniors still top the list of spelling averages.

In connection with our English course we are studying High School Grammar. We do, however, rejoice over the fact that only two themes a month are required.

At a class meeting last Thursday it was unanimously decided to send to our unfortunate class mate, Louette Daily, a letter of consolation and sympathy.

Since our Physics texts have arrived we are able to start our regular work. The first thing we have to consider is the Metric System of Measurements. We find this work rather dry just now but feel assured that the subject will be intensely interesting later on.

Christian Church Notes

Mr. Daily and daughter have the deepest sympathy of the whole church.

Every member of the Lloyd Boys and Girls Class are urged to be present next Sunday morning by their teacher.

An Evangelistic meeting will be held Saturday evening at the church, beginning at 7:30. All are urged to attend.

The regular morning worship will be held Sunday. Bible school at 9:30 a. m. Communion with a sermon by the pastor immediately after.

Mrs. Opel Wilmot will be hostess to the Martha Society Thursday afternoon. The entire membership is requested to be present as their is business to be attended to.

Every member of the Church and Sunday School as well as the entire community were shocked and greaved Wednesday evening, September 20, when word reached here that Mrs. Daily had passed away. And while we know her suffering is over we miss her at every turn. She had quietly endeared herself to us all, and was loved as a very dear sister who will be sadly missed not only by the church and Sunday School where her sweet voice sang praises, but in the Martha Society where she was a very efficient secretary, and in the other organisations of which she was a member. But she is safe with the Christ she loved and we feel that she has not lived here in vain, for her example for good will live forever.

"Covering the Subject"

Old Si Chestnut says: "An advertisement should be like a woman's dress—long enough to cover the subject, but short enough to be interesting."

All right. Here goes. Our subject: A check on our bank is better than a U. S. Treasury Note. Why? Because, if you loose your Treasury Note by fire, theft, hold-up or accident, it is gone for good, that's all. But if the same accident should happen to a check on our bank, you can stop payment and have a new check issued. Is that short enough to be interesting?

Apple Sales Start Monday

The Widney and Leighty Orchards will each open their annual apple sales next Monday morning at 9:30 o'clock. The crop this year is comparitively small with that of last year but an effort is being made on the part of the managements to give every customer his share.

Each Orchard will use its usual method of sale. Widney books no orders and makes no reservations, but sells its entire crop by the "first come, first served" method. Leighty books orders for the sale of its entire crop in advance.

This week pickers and sorters are busy getting ready for the opening.

The apples are sorted into two grades, firsts and seconds, and will probably sell for $2.00 and $1.00 per standard bushel.

Henry Krabill Took A Spill

Henry Krabill was a victim in an automobile accident last Thursday morning when his car slid off a 20 foot embankment and turned over several times, pinning Mr. Krabill and Mr. Berrel, another occupant of the car, underneath. The men succeeded in freeing themselves hurriedly. Mr. Krabill escaped injuries other than minor bruises while the other man was more severely hurt about the hips. The car was wrecked badly.

Mr. Krabill explains that in the act of passing a truck which was going in the same direction on the Waterloo-Butler road about a mile east of Waterloo he was crowded near the edge of the grade and he could not keep it from turning.

In Rememberance

In loving rememberance of our dear sister, Mrs. R. B. Daily, who passed away at Fort Wayne, Indiana, on September 20, 1922, while she is sadly missed among us, we feel that our loss is her eternal gain.

Sweet and peaceful be thy rest,
Forget you we never can;
God called the, He knew best;
His will be done forever.
Sleep on, sleep on dear one,
How sweet to breathe thy name;
In life we loved you dearly,
In death we do the same.
The flowers we place upon your

But the love for you, who sleeps

GENERAL:

SPELLING AVERAGES:

Junior	95.45
Freshmen	89.73
Senior	87.5

The basket ball teams are practising at the school grounds on Monday and Wednesday evening of each week.

The High School Orchestra has been organized and rehearsals are being held on Tuesday and Thursday evening of each week.

Attendance in the High School is not up to the standard. We wonder whether some of these students can do in fifteen days what the remainder of the class does in twenty. A day lost is gone forever.

The following is an extract from the DeKalb County School Bulletin: "All minors between the ages of fourteen and eighteen must secure a permit to work from the issuing officer of their vicinity. Failure to comply with this is a violation of the law on the part of the minor, his parents or guardians, and his employer."

GRAMMAR ROOM NOTES:

The Grammar Room is proud of the fact that it had only three days absence last month.

The seventh grade are patiently awaiting their doom which will come hard Fribay night.

The eighth grade have been having outline work in Grammar, but the Grammars have arrived at last and we are able to take up our regular work.

FRESHMEN:

The Seniors finally, after a very hard struggle, picked up the courage to initiate the freshmen. We had a very good time and wish to thank all the Seniors for the efforts they put forth to make us official members of the St. Joe High School.

We can't say so much for our spelling average this week, but watch for the next report! W. B.

SOPHOMORE:

At last we are "over the top" in spelling averages, even though it is by a very small margin.

We were allowed to grade each others Civics papers last week. This proved interesting as well as advantageous to all.

We are sorry that we did not start the study of Ancient History sooner as our lessons deal with the historical setting of the Sunday School lessons of last quarter.

JUNIOR:

A class meeting, for the purpose of electing officers, was held last Monday afternoon. The results of the election are as follows:

President Robert Johnson
Sec. Treas. Virginia Lawson
Class Sponsor Mabel Schmalzried

It was decided at this meeting that the class should hold weekly meetings, and assess each member five cents per week. This assessment was made in order to meet some of the expenses of the coming year.

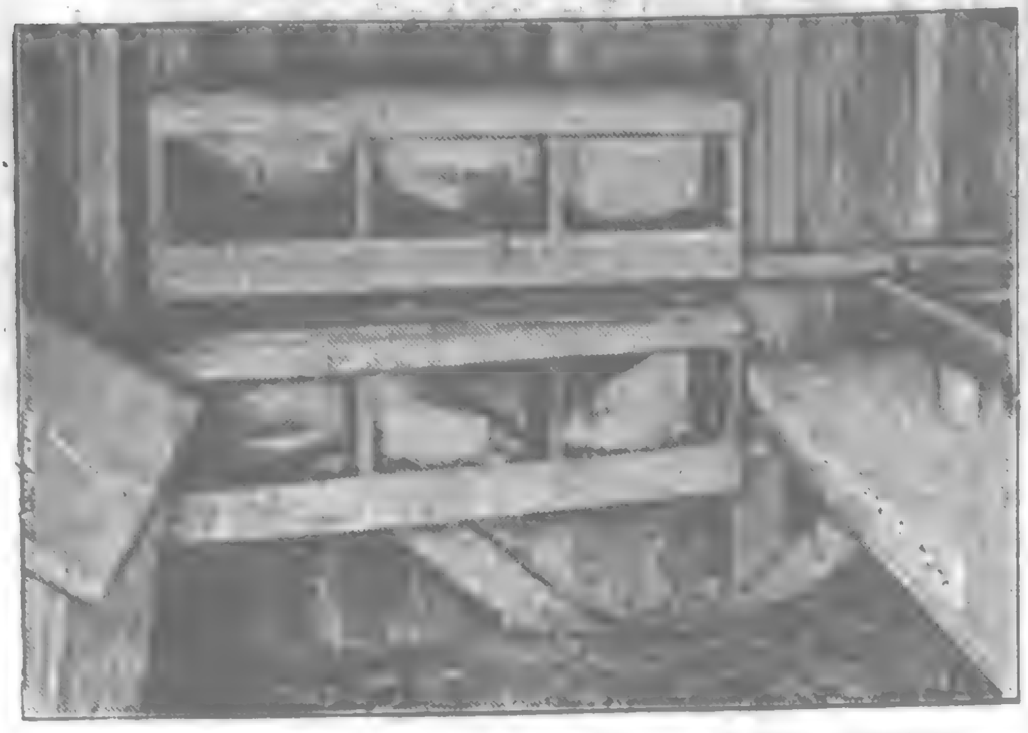
FEEDING IS MOST IMPORTANT IN GETTING PROFITS FROM POULTRY



Profits Are Greater When Houses Are Kept in Sanitary Condition.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Next to good breeding and health, good feeding is most important in getting profitable yields from the poultry flock. A few simple suggestions on feeds and practices, such as those in the following paragraphs from the United States Department of Agriculture, will help build up the egg yield.

Principal Grains Used.

The principal grains fed to poultry are corn, wheat, oats and barley. Corn and wheat are the most popular. Corn is the best and most economical single feed, but is very fattening and should always be used with some other grain. Wheat is the safest to feed alone. The usual practice of successful poultrymen is to feed a part of the daily grain ration ground. This is on the theory that it is easier to digest. Soft feed, while it is a little more economical, must not be overworked. Too much soft feed may cause digestive troubles.

Ways of Feeding.

Methods of feeding differ, but a good rule to try to follow is to have empty crops in the morning and never have them quite full until it is time for the chickens to go to roost. For the first feed, grain scattered in the litter in the morning is best, the sooner after the birds leave the roost the better. This induces them to exercise. Feed about one-third of the scratch mixture in the morning and the other two-thirds in the afternoon. A light morning feed keeps the hens hungry and exercising all day. Have the litter from three to six inches deep and dry. It may be of straw, hay, leaves or any other material of this sort.

Indicates Health of Fowl.

The condition of the droppings is a good indication of the hen's health. They should be of enough firmness to hold their shape, but not solid. The normal color is dark, shading off into grayish white. Droppings that are soft or pasty and of a yellowish or brownish color indicate too much fat or a lack of meat. If the droppings are watery and dark with red splashes of mucus in them, too much meat is being fed. A greenish, water diarrhea usually is evidence of insanitary conditions, either in the surroundings, the feed or the water.

A ration must necessarily be based on local conditions and prices, but any of those quoted below will be found satisfactory.

MULCHING THE SOIL TO SAVE MOISTURE

Covering Must Be the Kind That Will Not Blow Away.

Dust and Straw, Except in Orchards or Berry Patches, Not Satisfactory; Water Will Evaporate Quickly.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Thirty years of investigation by the United States Department of Agriculture and the much longer experience of practical farmers have demonstrated that about the only way of conserving soil moisture for the use of agricultural plants in the regions of scanty rainfall is to provide a suitable seed-bed for their germination and early growth and to prevent useless weeds that would otherwise compete with them. Theoretically, covering or mulching the soil for the purpose of preventing the loss of soil moisture is very efficient; practically, it has very narrow limitations.

There are several things required of a soil covering or mulch besides simply preventing the loss of moisture. Among these may be mentioned the following: It must "stay put"; that is to say, it must be of such character that it will not be blown away by the high winds common to all arid regions. This rules out all dust and straw mulches, except possibly in orchards or berry patches, and, in them, the straw mulch is frequently objectionable on account of its harboring rodents, especially field mice. A soil covering must let rain into the soil. This rules out the dust mulch which is almost, if not quite impervious to ordinary rainfall, as it puddles producing a sheet of paste over the surface that prevents the water from reaching the roots of the crop plants.

A straw mulch, if thick enough to prevent the growth of weeds, will absorb most, if not all, of an ordinary rainfall. The water thus absorbed will evaporate very quickly, as soon as the [illegible] the roots of the crop plants.

HOW MANY SEEDS IN POUND?

United States Department of Agriculture Makes Count of Number in Various Kinds of Grasses.

Counts to determine the relation between the number of grass seeds to the pound and the number of pounds required per acre to assure a good stand of grass, have been made by the United States Department of Agriculture. In general, the fine-seeded grasses require fewer pounds of seed to the acre than do the coarse-seeded varieties.

The work of the department shows that timothy on the average has 1,200,000 seeds in a pound. Kentucky blue grass has 2,400,000 and Redtop, 4,000,000, while Sudan grass has only 50,000. Orchard grass has 500,000; Canada blue grass, 2,700,000; tall meadow grass, 150,000; meadow fescue, 240,000; foxtail millet, 200,000; sheep's fescue, 680,000; red fescue, 500,000 seeds; Italian rye grass, 280,000; perennial rye grass, 280,000; and Bermuda grass, 1,800,000.

Timothy usually is seeded at the rate of 15 pounds to the acre; Kentucky blue glass, 14 to 18 pounds; Redtop, 10 pounds; and Bermuda grass, 5 pounds. Orchard grass is usually sown at the rate of 25 pounds to the acre; Canada blue grass, 15 pounds; and tall meadow oat grass, 40 pounds. Meadow fescue requires 25 pounds to the acre, [illegible] rye grass is sown at the rate of 30 to 40 pounds per acre, perennial rye grass, 30 pounds; and Sudan grass, 12 to 25 pounds per acre.

There are some 6,000 distinct species of cultivated and wild grasses in the world but only about 20 of these are of importance in the United States.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU

ILLINOIS PICNIC AT OLNEY BIG SUCCESS

Barnyard Golf Features Annual Play Day of Farm Bureau Folks—Good Speakers.

This year Illinois Farm bureau folks enjoyed their annual play day at Olney in Richland county. It was the third annual picnic of the Illinois Agricultural association, and more than 6,000 people braved a two-day rain to attend.

Barnyard golf, the big feature of the annual picnic, attracted the attention of the crowd early in the forenoon. Fourteen two-man teams from as many counties were entered in the tournament for the silver loving cup trophy. Ed Torbet and Joe Heskett, expert horseshoe throwers from DeWitt county and winners of the tournaments at the past two annual picnics, were again entered bent on winning the trophy the third time, so that it would be their permanent prize.

It was an easy matter for the easy-going DeWitt farmers to win their way through the preliminaries and in the finals they were opposed by the team representing Douglas county. The twice-champs took two straight games easily, 50-23 and 50-21, Heskett of the DeWitt team throwing nineteen ringers in the two games. Torbert, who is said to be the better pitcher of the two, pitched unconcernedly while smoking his pipe, and seemed content to let his partner do the scoring.

The program of speaking came shortly after noon with Howard Leonard, Illinois, and John Coverdale, secretary of the American Farm Bureau federation as the principal speakers. Senator Kessinger urged farmers to stick to organization work. The keynote of his address was: "There is no chance for the unorganized farmer in this organized world."

Secretary Coverdale emphasized the important features of the Farm bureau, and showed what the Farm bureau can do for the American farmer.

CO-OPERATIVE PLAN BIG AID TO FARMER

Dairymen of Stephenson County, Illinois, Say Milk and Cream Can Be Sold at Profit.

Eight hundred farmers of Stephenson county, Illinois, say co-operative marketing of dairy products is successful. These farmers are stockholders in the Stephenson County Marketing company, and the excellent receiving and manufacturing plant at Freeport is eloquent testimony to the fact that milk and cream can be marketed profitably by organized farmers.

Stephenson county farmers have a lot of pride in their company because in the short period of less than a year its growth has been such as to make it conspicuous in the field of co-operative marketing. The organization, from its inception, has been characterized by a spirit of loyalty and enthusiasm which has in no small way been instrumental in its success.

When the dairymen of Stephenson county decided to revolt against the low prices which had always prevailed in their dairy product market, they went about it in a systematic way. First, they appealed to the County Farm bureau, and its adviser, G. F. Baumeister, to help in making the preliminary moves in forming an organization such as they wanted. The county farm bureau, co-operating with the Illinois Agricultural association and C. Larson of its department of dairy product marketing, undertook to make a comprehensive study of the matter.

A representative was sent to the states of Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin to make a survey of co-operative creameries and co-operative marketing in those states. From the facts obtained from this survey, the organization of the company was put in motion in September, 1921. Five hundred farmers were signed up in a short time, and the company was incorporated with a capital stock of $50,000.

A large lot was purchased in Freeport and a modern creamery and receiving plant of brick construction was erected. Two pools were put in operation at once, one for fluid milk and one for cream. The returns to the members were so much better than they had been before that many additional farmers asked to join the company. Now the membership numbers around 800, and the capital has been increased to $75,000.

Under the able management of Alfred Ahrensen, the milk and cream receipts have increased each week. The milk received is sold at wholesale to dealers in Freeport, and some to Chicago. The bulk of the remainder is sold to a local condensery. When the cheese market is favorable, considerable whole milk is used in the manufacture of cream cheese. Another quantity of milk is separated each day and the sweet cream is sold to local dealers.

The cream received is manufactured into butter which finds a large and desirable market through its high quality. It has established a reputation under the trade mark, "Vitagold." More than 75,000 pounds of butter have been manufactured each month during the summer.

In addition to housing the plant and the company's office, the main building provides office quarters for the Stephenson County Farm bureau, an organization which has always worked hand in hand with the marketing company.

As an organization, the company moves and progresses with machine-like precision. Scientific and modern principles of business and marketing have been the guide marks in building up a marketing success that is as strong as its 800 members.

ATTENTION TO POTATO CROP

South Dakota Warehouses Have Ample Facilities for Grading, Sorting and Loading.

As Hamlin county became one of the leading potato producers of South Dakota, it became necessary to look for an outside market.

As is usually the case where large quantities of potatoes are raised no attention was given to the grading, sorting and packing according to market demands, a number of the growers' potatoes were becoming diseased and run out, thereby resulting in much loss when reaching the terminal market because of the quality. Also with the increased production came the difficulty of being able to load cars without considerable amount of loss in time as well as hard work connected with the loading operations.

Highway Improvement

LINKING UP STATE SYSTEMS

Progressive Step Attributed to Requirements of Federal-Aid Legislation.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A recent meeting of New England state highway officials and engineers of the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture, marks an important point in the development of highways in this country. This is the first meeting ever held between officials empowered to act, for the purpose of laying out a system of highways to serve an area larger than a single state. It is the first of a series of similar meetings which will be held between the federal officials and highway authorities of various groups of states, the object of which will be the solution of the problem for the whole country.

This progressive step, long wished for by all users of the highways, can be attributed to the requirements of federal-aid legislation. It is required that all federal aid be spent on a connected system of highways designed to serve the needs of the whole country. Tentative systems have been submitted by all except eight states, and now the series of meetings is being held to connect and co-ordinate the proposed state systems.

The bureau of public roads intends to push this work as rapidly as possible, so as to lay before the people the plans for what will be by far the greatest highway system in the world. At present only roads certain to be on the system are being approved for construction with federal aid; in May more than twenty miles of completed road was added to the system on each working day. It is estimated that the system will comprise 180,000 miles of highway.

An Improved Road in Red Bank, N. J. Before and After Its Completion.

LARGE STATE ROAD PROGRAM

South Carolina Wants to Spend $34,000,000 on Improvements in Next Six Years.

A proposal to spend $34,000,000 within six years and to complete within that time 4,000 miles of the state system, more than 600 miles of which would be hard surfaced and the remainder surfaced with sand-clay, top soil, or gravel is to be urged upon the legislature of South Carolina. In order that this proposal should conform to the federal aid acts the state highway officials recently held conferences with representatives of the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture.

If this greatly expanded program is carried out, the state will match all of the federal aid money now available and any future appropriation that may become available. Funds will be raised by automobile licenses, by continuing the state-wide two-mill property tax, a one-cent-per-gallon motor fuel tax, plus a bond issue of $10,000,000.

HIGHWAY RULES ARE STRICT

Vehicles Not Permitted to Carry More Than Fourteen Tons Without Special Permit.

In Massachusetts no vehicle may travel over the highway which, with its load, weighs more than fourteen tons without a special permit and the load must not exceed 800 pounds upon tire inch of the vehicle. No motor vehicle which, with its load, weighs more than four tons, is allowed to travel at a speed of over four miles per hour if equipped with metallic tires, or over twelve miles per hour if equipped with tires of rubber or similar substances. The outside width of a vehicle is limited to eight feet.

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It

Applicants for Insurance Often Rejected.

Judging from reports from druggists who are constantly in direct touch with the public, there is one preparation that has been very successful in overcoming these conditions. The mild and healing influence of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its remarkable record of success.

An examining physician for one of the prominent Life Insurance Companies, in an interview on the subject, made the astonishing statement that one reason why so many applicants for insurance are rejected is because kidney trouble is so common to the American people, and the large majority of those whose applications are declined do not even suspect that they have the disease. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is on sale at all drug stores in bottles of two sizes, medium and large.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

"THE FRAUD OF MEN"

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

IT WAS in the reception room of a club house in an inland city, where the two young men had met by chance that evening. There was a stuffy profusion of leather furniture in the room that gave it a heavy cast. Men were talking in knots of two or three, apparently on business, and when an outsider entered a group, conversation was distinctly and painfully suspended, or lagged in cold formalities until he had drifted away. The men there were clearly business men, and were there by business appointment, and the element of sociability was manifested only in the click of the billiard balls that echoed in from some invisible rear room, where the younger men, too tired to go to the theater, or to the evening gathering with their wives or sweethearts, were walking uncounted miles after the ivory balls.

It was a brisk autumn evening, and the clock on the mantel was striking eight when two young men pulled their fat chairs to the window, where they could see the theater-goers hurrying by under the arc light, and where they might not be interrupted.

"Well, old man, what d'you think of the East," asked the shorter of the two, a very stubby little man with a red face, red lips and a bristling, close-cropped mustache. His companion was a tall man with skinny features, square shoulders, a head poised too far back at times, but capable of bending, and he had a habit of picking at his mustache.

"Oh, d—n the East," said the tall young man. "Jim, I'll tell you what's a God's truth, they are the worst lot of jays back there—absolutely the worst that grow on earth. They don't know any more about this country, and what's in it, than a satrap o' Persia. When I told them about our scheme, showed them the map of all this land that is to be foreclosed, and how the whole thing can be watered by a central ditch, and all—you remember how it is out there—one old rooster who hasn't been out of his barnyard in all his life, he up and said: 'Yes, all very good, very good, indeed, but supposing there is an Indian outbreak—then where's all our money for your improvements gone?' Say, Jim, I just fell right over dead. I met old man Wilson there—say, hold on here, what's this I hear? There goes Martin and his kids, taking them to Ali Baba; see what you're coming to. So you finally got your nerve with you, did you? Go-o-od!"

With this outburst the bubbles of the promoter's enthusiasm subsided. His companion reddened slightly at the raillery and put one side of his under lip over his stubby mustache in an embarrassed silence that ended in a smirk.

"Well, Harris," he responded addressing the taller friend, "you've guessed it the first time, I suppose. But we must all settle down sooner or later, and anyway a man don't find that kind of a girl every day in the year." He paused a moment and Harris broke in:

"Oh, yes, if it comes to that, I suppose he must. I ain't a-kicking any, am I? Now, Jimmy, that's a good boy, come and t'l ownest own all about—" He was interrupted in his mock coddling by one of the drifters—who had been knocked from half a dozen groups, and had floated around in front of the formidable chairs. He was a pretty old man, who had been a country banker in his day, and had come up and put new life into a wobbling institution after a local panic. He cut in with: "Well, what are you kids gassing about? Hello, there, Harris, did you make your irrigation scheme go?"

Harris looked up with annoyance written unmistakably on his face as he said, hardly civilly, "Yep," and lapsed into silence.

There was a pause, in which Jim addressed a remark to Harris about the big crowd that was going to the theater. A street car had just unloaded at the corner. The Kansas man took the remark as general, and replied:

"Say, ain't they though; been that way, too, every night this week."

"Lookie quick!" exclaimed Harris to his companion. "No—this side—there goes Cameron; who's that with her? Got a new 'mash'?"

"Why, you don't mean to say that you haven't heard," replied Jim, as he shifted his position in his chair. "She's going to get married, too. All the old birds going home to nest."

"Why, do you boys know Mrs. Cameron?" asked the banker with some surprise. "I didn't know she was in your set."

"Ho! Ho! And so you know the widow, too? L. No. 384 of the Cameron series, eh, Jimmy?" said Harris.

The woman, holding to a rather slender young fellow, perhaps thirty-five years old, dark and serious, who was watchfully bending over her, to catch her chatter, passed the club window, and disappeared in the cover of darkness that surrounded the arc light. She was a woman who, even on close inspection, showed [illegible] though instinct would have [illegible] a dozen [illegible] and tripped, rather than walked, along. One would have said that she was very happy as she passed.

"Me? Oh, yes, I knew Mrs. Cameron when she was a little girl," said the elder man. "She came from my town—down in Baxter. Say, how is she making it here? I haven't seen her for going on two years now—two years next December, I think," mused the banker. The two young fellows looked quizzically at the old man, and then at each other. Then Harris shook his head and the short, fat, little man nodded back. They were satisfied that the old man was telling the truth.

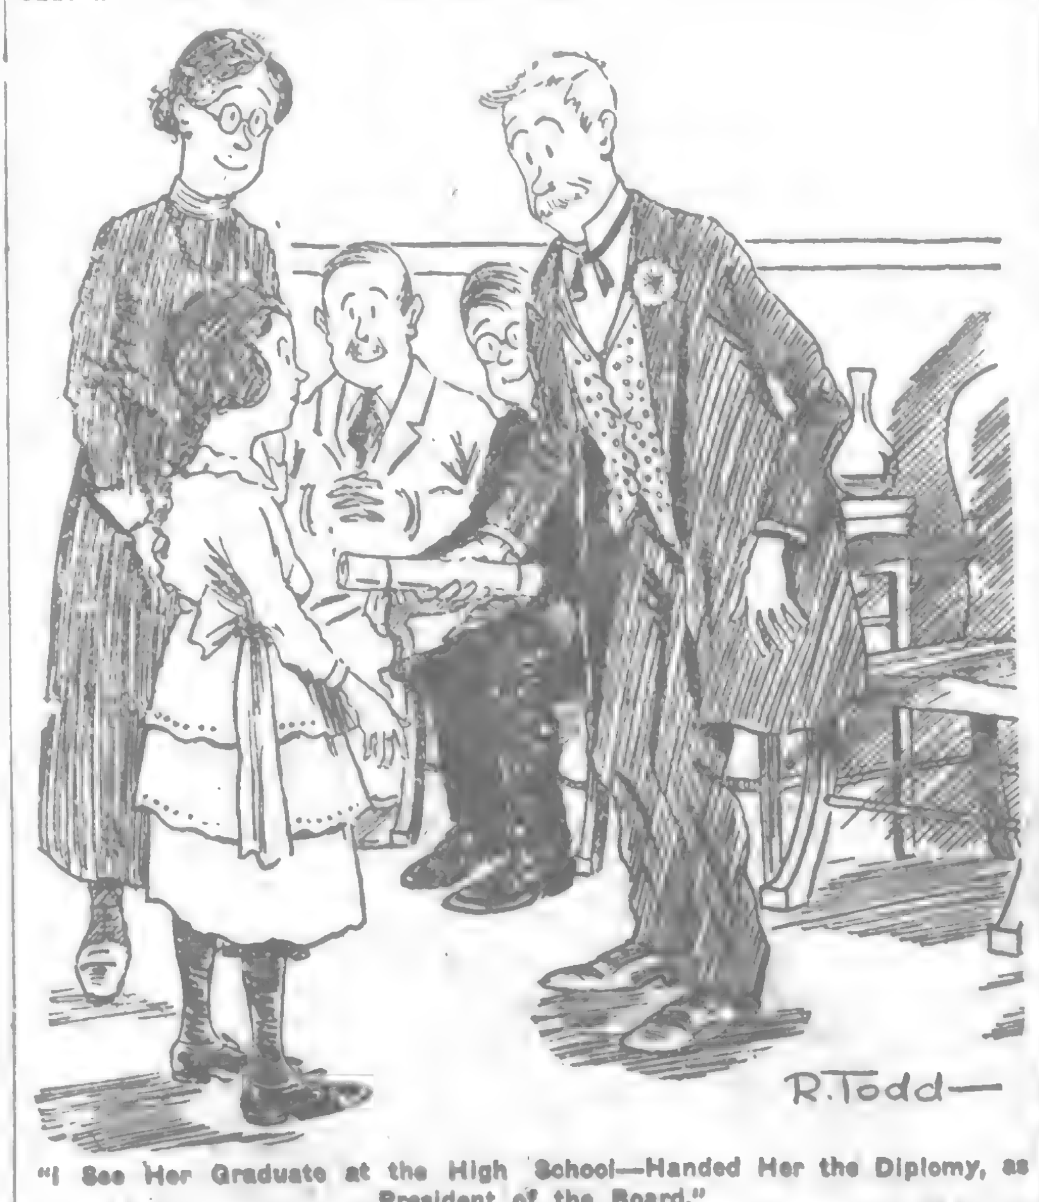
"Well," began Jimmy, "she wasn't cut out for a vagabond, and she hasn't been making it very well, I guess."

"What's the matter?" said the old man, who did not grasp the young fellow's meaning.

"Well, Mr. Martin, if you care to know, it's nothing more unusual than wolves," replied Harris, as he swung his feet over the arm of the chair; "just plain, old-fashioned wolves. But I'm mighty glad she is going to break for shelter. I'm mighty glad for her," Harris added in broken sentences. "Who's the fellow, Jimmy?" he asked a moment later.

"Byers," put in Jimmy, in answer to Harris' question, as Martin rubbed his chin, and pulled up a chair to sit down and get the idea firmly fixed in his mind.

"Going to get married!" continued the old banker, thinking aloud. "Well, if that don't beat all! Well, boys, I've knowed her since she was a little slip of a girl—couldn't a been more'n ten years old—when they moved to Baxter. I see her graduate at the high school—handed her the diplomy, as president of the board, myself. And she's going to get married again. Well, that gets me. I went to her wedding with old Cameron. She was the oldest of seven children, four of 'em girls, and Mrs. Griggs was mighty glad to get Mattie off her hands, though she wasn't more'n eighteen when she was married; but every one thought she done so well, getting old Cameron, and his fine house that he'd built her—and all. But I'd a thought she'd a got enough of marrying when she got done with old Cameron. If ever a woman lived ten years in h—l, that woman did. And such a nice little woman, too. Seemed like she tried ever so hard to make it pleasant; done all her own work, flaxed around and fixed up the house, putting little odds and ends here and there, keeping up with the Chautauquy, and having the young folks around her, and being just the world and all to them babies of her'n. Hardly anyone knowed they was anything wrong, until she filed her suit. And we didn't know it, ourselves, living right there, until two years before, when old Cameron come home and chased her out of the house, one cold winter night, and she had to come over to our house or freeze. Many and many's the time she's stayed out all night of summers, when he'd come home full and ugly, rather than let the neighbor's know. Well, I must tell mother she's a-going to get married again."



"I See Her Graduate at the High School—Handed Her the Diplomy, as President of the Board."

"Old Man Cameron, he warn't so mean with men, that way. Take him in the bank, and though he was in the opposition concern, I can say that I never heard a man say an unkind thing of him, and that's a good deal for a banker. My wife says Mrs. Cameron told her that there was times when he would be awful sorry, and promise to do better, and be as rational as you or me. But he got them jealous spells and was a regular devil, she said. Used to beat her I guess, though she never said so. One time—so she told my wife—after one of his tantrums—that was pretty near the end—he had went down to Cincinnati, and while he was gone, she made up her mind to leave [illegible]. When he came home he wanted to be sugar and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] amount of little trinkets [illegible]. It was the first time he had ever done anything of the kind, and when she was getting supper for him, she told my wife, he set the table with the new things, and put the trinkets at her place, and the sacque in her chair, and then called her to see it. She come in and shook her head, and turned to the kitchen door without a word. And she told my wife if she'd 'a' tried to said a word, she would 'a' burst out crying.

"It was hard for her, but she did what was for the best, I guess. 'Twouldn't 'a' been six months before old man Cameron would 'a' been up to his old tricks again. She knew that then, just as well as I know it now. But he was so big and strong, and I suppose he was tender, too, when he felt like it. But that was a mighty brave thing to do, and I shouldn't wonder if she cried that night for the first time in years—he'd hardened her that way, you know, for so long before."

There was no one with a voice to speak, when the old man paused, so he sighed and continued: "And now she's going to get married, eh? Who's the fellow?"

Morrison was the first to speak. "A man named Byers, of Denver," he said. "Did you know her after she came down here, Mr. Martin?"

"Only a little; she was trying to learn to be a trained nurse or something; used to see her at the theater, with young fellows from the club. She came back to Baxter, now and then. Wife saw her there, and said she appeared to be cheerful. And the old ladies were tickled to death to see her. Made up a tea-party for her, about six months ago, when my wife and she happened to be back together at the same time, and my wife said they, every one of them old people—made over her like she was their own child, and she did seem to be so happy. What about the wolves, Harris? Tell me," said the elder man as he lighted a cigar and looked grimly at the charred match before throwing it away.

"There isn't much to tell, I guess. If every man would only tell what he knows, himself, there would be blame little. But as every other man tells what he thinks a lot of other fellows know—it's the old story, and a good deal too long. The chief trouble with wolves, you know, is their noise."

"It occurs to me, Harris," said young Jimmy Morrison with a knowing look sideways, "that you are getting mighty high-minded all of a sudden. I say it's a shame about young Byers, of Denver. He seems to be a pretty decent fellow."

"Has a little money, hasn't he?" chipped in Harris.

"Sheep-buyer for a packing house, I believe. We had some dealing with him," said the banker, as he puffed and put his hands back of his head as a pillow for a moment.

"Something like that," said Jimmy. "Anyway, he looks like an honest fellow. Somebody ought to tell him about Cameron. It's tough to see him going into this thing—like an ox to the slaughter."

"Oh, you do, do you? Well, Jimmy Morrison, maybe you would like to have the same man, who tells what he has heard of this woman, tell the same thing to the future Mrs. Morrison, a few weeks before the cards are out."

"Do you boys know you are talking of a human being? This business that is so funny to you, it is all of that woman's life! It's your farce maybe; but, great God, it's her—her—her tragedy!"

After an abashed silence Martin walked slowly away from the two friends. Each one thought, for an instant of a face that he remembered lighted up by the warm glow of the grate fire. Each knew the story as the old man had told it. Each thought of the way he had heard it. It was fully a minute after the old man walked away with his hands behind him, when Harris spoke:

"Funny thing, this life, ain't it?" he said.

"Yes, damned funny—the more you know of it," said Morrison as he arose. "Isn't it [illegible] [illegible]? Whose turn is it to buy the [illegible] Parisian?"

GRANDMOTHER PORK

"Grunt, grunt," said Grandfather Porky Pig.

"Squeal, squeal," said Miss Ham.

"Grunt, grunt, squeal, squeal," said Sir Percival Pork.

"Squeal, squeal," said Sir Benjamin Bacon.

"Grunt, grunt," said Mrs. Pink Pig.

"Squeal, squeal," said Mrs. Pinky Pig.

"Grunt, grunt," said Pinky Pig's mother.

Then Sammy Sausage came walking along and he too said "Grunt, grunt!"

Pretty soon Brother Bacon walked to the part of the pig pen where were gathered all the other pigs and he said:

"Grunt, grunt."

"Squeal, squeal," said Sammy Sausage as he twisted his little tail into a knot.

"Grunt, grunt," said Pinky Pig and Master Pink Pig said, "Squeal, squeal."

"Well, well, well, grunt, grunt, grunt, squeal, squeal, squeal," said Grandmother Pork, who had just arrived in the Pig Pen.

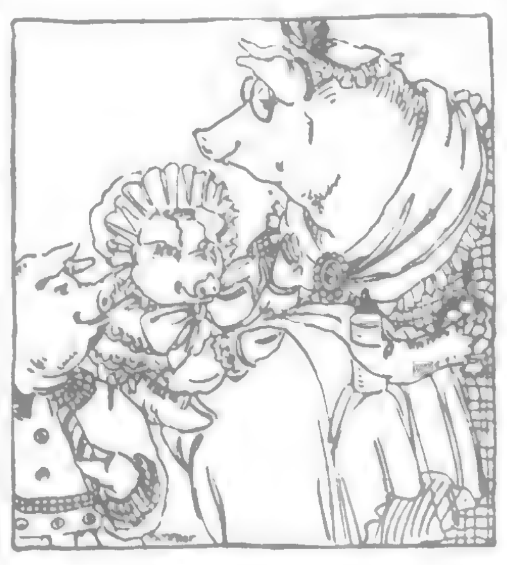
"It is nice of you all to greet me as you do," she said. "I am pleased to meet you and hope you have plenty of food in these parts."

All the pigs squealed and Grandmother Pork knew she had made a good impression, and they thought she was natural and without airs and graces.

"Well," she continued, "as I said, I am delighted to meet you and I am glad you welcome me as you do.

"A welcome makes a great deal of difference. Now I will tell you about myself and in that way you will more quickly become acquainted with me.

"I do not want you to feel that I am a stranger. I am a nice, good-natured, friendly, pleasant old hog, and my name is Grandmother Pork.



"I Love Little Pigs."

"I believe that Grandfather Porky Pig here is a cousin of mine."

"Yes, yes, grunt, grunt," said Grandfather Porky Pig.

"Of course," Grandmother Pork continued, "we are all cousins."

And the pigs all squealed and grunted as they twisted their crooked little tails.

"It is true. We are all cousins."

"But I am a first cousin of Grandfather Porky Pig and second or third cousin to most of the rest of you. I'm first cousin, once removed, to a few I've never quite known what that 'once removed' meant because I've never been removed from any of them once or twice or three times.

"Of course we go our different ways, but I wouldn't speak of having cousins 'once removed' had not I been told that that was correct.

"Well, I have had two hundred children and many, many grandchildren and a good mother and a good grandmother have I been.

"I looked after all my children myself and whenever I heard one squeal my big snout would be getting at the trouble and I would be looking worried, for I had pig love in my pig heart for my pig children.

"Some mother pigs become nervous and eat their little ones, but not so many, not so many.

"I've always been considered a perfect mother and I'm glad to be considered that, for I love little pigs—dear, cunning, pink, squealing little darlings.

"So now you know about me, and here I am, a new addition to this pig pen."

"And a fine addition," said the other pigs. "Squeal, squeal, grunt, grunt, Grandmother Pork, we're glad to have you with us."

Then the farmer came out with some food, and Grandmother Pork hurried toward it as quickly as the others did.

"She's good and spry," they all said as they winked at each other.

A Waste of Good English.

BIBLE THOUGHT —FOR TODAY—

The BACK TO THE BIBLE Bureau Service

A MORNING PRAYER:-- Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me.--Psalm 51:10.

IF:—If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways:

THEN:—Then will I hear from heaven, and I will forgive their sin, and will heal their land.—2 Chronicles 7:14.

IF:—If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul;

THEN:—Then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noonday: and the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones.—Isaiah 58:10, 11.

RICHES DO NOT SATISFY:—He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes?—Ecclesiastes 5:10, 11.

RULER OVER ALL:—Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty; for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all.—1 Chronicles 29:11.

THE LAWYER'S QUESTION:—Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?

JESUS ANSWER:—Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind: and thy neighbour as thyself. This do and thou shalt live.—Luke 10: 25, 27, 28.

USE HEAVENLY BANKS:—Lay not up for yourselves treasure upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: For where your treasure is there will your heart be also.—Matthew 6:19-21.

REMEMBER THE POOR:—If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail; or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof; if I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone.—Job 31: 16, 17, 19, 21.

OCTOBER

FIFTY YEARS AGO

A young man who practiced medicine in Pennsylvania became famous and was called in consultation in many towns and cities because of his success in the treatment of disease. This was Dr. Pierce, who finally made up his mind to place some of his medicines before the public, and moving to Buffalo, N. Y., put up what he called his "Favorite Prescription," and placed it with the druggists in every state.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has long been recognized as a tonic for diseases peculiar to womankind. After suffering pain, feeling nervous, dizzy, weak and dragged-down by weaknesses of her sex—a woman is quickly restored to health by its use. Misused Figure of Speech.

A young writer, not much given to revision, recently sent out a story wherein the following occurred:

Appeal to Intellect.

"Why did you introduce vaudeville in your campaigning tour?"

"My constituents," replied Senator Sorghum, "know more about the economic situation than I do. They are intelligent people, and I approach them as such. The brain needs rest. I am going to earn their gratitude by giving them a chance to take their minds off politics."

Some people hope for the best only under protest and are disappointed when it happens.

Is Backache Crippling You?

Is that dull, nagging backache making it hard for you to get around? Are you lame, sore and tortured with sharp, rheumatic pains? It's time, then, you gave some attention to your kidneys! An Ohio Case

H. L. Pitsinger, blacksmith, 428 High St., Eaton, Ohio, says: "When I stooped I had sharp stabs of pain through my back and when I straightened quickly, my back cramped so I could hardly move. My kidneys were weak and acted irregularly, so at night I had to get up several times. Friends highly praised Doan's Kidney Pills, so I got some. Doan's relieved me of all the pains and regulated my kidneys."

"Ah, here are Fell and Ansley!" exclaimed Maillard, almost with relief. "I—ah—my friends, I don't suppose you've seen Bob recently?"

Ansley was silent. Jachin Fell, however, responded with a cold nod of assent.

"Yes," he said in his peculiarly toneless manner. "Yes, we have. At least, I believe it was he——"

"I'm worried," said Maillard, anxiously, hurriedly. He made an expressive gesture of despair. "He's in costume, of course. I've been given to understand that—well, that he has been—well, drinking."

"He has," said Jachin Fell, without any trace of compassion. "A number of the Krewe are occupying one of the rooms in the building, and they must have been visiting it frequently. I trust for your sake that the fact hasn't become generally known inside?"

Maillard nodded. Shame and anger lay heavily in his eyes.

Judge Forester, in his kindly way, laid his hand on the banker's arm.

"Tut, tut, Joseph," he said, gently, a fund of sympathy in his voice. "Boys will be boys, you know; really, this is no great matter! Don't let it hit you so hard. I'll go with you to find the room, of course. Where is it, Jachin?"

"We'll all go," put in Ansley. "We'll have a little party of our own, gentlemen. Come on, I believe we'll be able to discover the place."

The four men left the foyer and started through the corridors.

"I hear," said Judge Forester to Doctor Ansley, as they followed the other two, "that there has been astonishing news today from the Midnight Masquer. It seems that a number of people have received back property this afternoon—loot the bandit had taken. It appears to have been some sort of a carnival joke, after all."

"A poor one, then," responded Ansley, "and in doubtful taste. I've heard nothing of it. I wouldn't mind getting back the little cash I lost, though I must say I'll believe the story when I see the money——"

He broke off quickly.

As they turned a corner of the corridor to the four men came realization that they had attained their goal. From one of the rooms ahead there sounded snatches of a boisterous chorus being roared forth lustily. As they halted, to distinguish from which door the singing proceeded, the chorus was broken off by an abrupt and sudden silence. This silence was accentuated by the preceding noise, as though the singers had checked their maudlin song in mid-career.

"D—n it!" muttered Maillard. "Did they hear us coming? No, that wouldn't matter a hang to them—but what checked them so quickly?"

"This door," said Fell, indicating one to their right. He paused at it, listening, and over his features came a singular expression. As the others joined him, they caught a low murmur of voices, a hushed sound of talk, a rattle as a number of chips fell from a table.

"Cursed queer!" observed Jachin Fell, frowning. "I wonder what happened to them so abruptly? Perhaps the deal was finished—they're having a game. Well, go ahead, Joseph! We'll back you up as a deputation from the blackcoats, and if you need any moral support, call on Judge Forester."

That gentleman flung open the door, and Maillard entered at his side. They then came to a startled halt, at view of the scene which greeted them.

The room was large and well lighted, windows and transom darkened for the occasion. Tobacco smoke made a bluish haze in the air. In the center of the room stood a large table, littered with glasses and bottles, with scattered cards, with chips and money.

About this table had been sitting half a dozen members of the Krewe of Comus. Now, however, they were standing, their various [illegible] completely concealed by the grotesque costumes [illegible] them. [illegible] hands were in the air. [illegible]

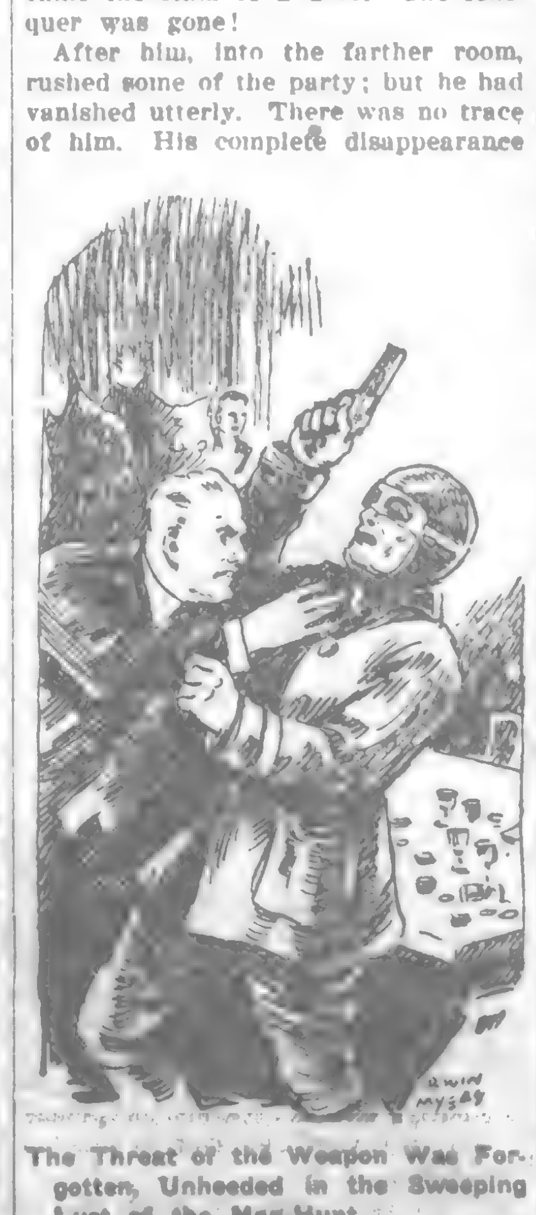
Perhaps because the Masquer did not fire instantly, and perhaps because Maillard's mad action shamed them, the nearer members of the drinking party hurled themselves at the bandit. The threat of the weapon was forgotten, unheeded in the sweeping lust of the man-hunt. It seemed that the fellow feared to fire, and about him closed the party in a surging mass, with a burst of sudden shouts, striking and clutching to pull him down and put him under foot.

Then, when it seemed that they had him without a struggle, the Masquer broke from them, swept them apart and threw them off, hurled them clear away. He moved as though to leap through the side doorway whence he had come.

With an oath, Maillard hurled himself forward, struck blindly and furiously at the bandit, and fastened upon him about the waist. There was a surge forward of bodies as the others crowded in to pull down the Masquer before he could escape. It looked then as though he were indeed lost—until the automatic flamed and roared in his hand, its choking fumes bursting at them. The report thundered in the room; a second report thundered, deafeningly, as a second bullet sought its mark.

Like a faint echo to those shots came the slam of a door. The Masquer was gone!

After him, into the farther room, rushed some of the party; but he had vanished utterly. There was no trace of him. His complete disappearance confused the searchers. After a moment, however, they returned to the lighted room. The Masquer had gone, but behind him had remained a more grim and terrible masquer.



The Threat of the Weapon Was Forgotten, Unheeded in the Sweeping Lust of the Man-Hunt.

In the room which he had just left, however, there had fallen a dread silence and consternation. One of the masqued drinkers held an arm that hung helpless, dripping blood; but his hurt passed unseen and uncared for, even by himself.

Doctor Ansley was kneeling above a motionless figure, prone on the dirty floor; and it was the figure of Joseph Maillard. The physician glanced up, then rose slowly to his feet. He made a terribly significant gesture, and his crisp voice broke in upon the appalled silence.

"[illegible]," he said, curtly. "Shot twice—each bullet through the heart. Judge Forester, I'm afraid there is no alternative but to call in the police. Gentlemen, you will kindly unmask—where [illegible] Robert Maillard?"

desolate, so far as its offices were concerned. The cleaners and scrub women had long since finished their tasks and departed. Out in the streets the tag-ends of carnival were running on a swiftly ebbing tide. A single elevator in the building was, however, in use. A single suite of offices, with carefully drawn blinds, was lighted and occupied.

They were not ornate, these offices. They consisted of two rooms, a small reception room and a large private office, both lined to the ceiling with books, chiefly law books. In the larger room were sitting three men. One of the three, Ben Chacherre, sat in a chair tipped back against the wall, his eyes closed. From time to time he opened those sparkling black eyes of his, and through narrow-slitted lids directed keen glances at the other two men.

One of the men was the chief of police. The second was Jachin Fell, whose offices these were.

"Even if things are as you say, which I don't doubt at all," said the chief, slowly, "I can't believe the boy did it! And darn it all, if I pinch him there's goin' to be a h— of a scandal!"

Fell shrugged his shoulders, and made response in his toneless voice:

"Chief, you're up against facts. Those facts are bound to come out and the newspapers will nail your hide to the wall in a minute. You've a bare chance to save yourself by taking in young Maillard at once."

The chief chewed hard on his cigar. "I don't want to save myself by putting the wrong man behind the bars," he returned. "It sure looks like he was the Masquer all the while, but you say that he wasn't. You say this was his only job—a joke that turned out bad."

"Those are the facts," said Fell. "I don't want to accuse a man of crimes I know he did not commit. We have the best of evidence that he did commit this crime. If the newspapers fasten the entire Midnight Masquer business on him, as they're sure to do, we can't very well help him. I have no sympathy for the boy."

"Of course he did it," put in Ben Chacherre, sleepily. "Wasn't he caught with the goods?"

The others paid no heed. The chief indicated two early editions of the morning papers, which lay on the desk in front of Fell. These papers carried full accounts of the return of the Midnight Masquer's loot, explaining his robberies as part of a carnival jest.

"The later editions, comin' out now," said the chief, "will crowd all that stuff off the front page with the Maillard murder. Darn it, Fell! Whether I believe it or not, I'll have to arrest the young fool."

Chacherre chuckled. Jachin Fell smiled faintly.

"Nothing could be plainer, chief," he responded. "First, Bob Maillard comes to us in front of the opera house, and talks about a great joke that he's going to spring on his friends across the way——"

"How'd you know who he was?" interjected the chief, shrewdly.

"Gramont recognized him; Ansley and I confirmed the recognition. He was more or less intoxicated—chiefly more. Now, young Maillard was not in the room at the moment of the murder—unless he was the Masquer. Five minutes afterward he was found in a nearby room, hastily changing out of an aviator's uniform into his masquerade costume. Obviously, he had assumed the guise of the Masquer as a joke on his friends, and the joke had a tragic ending. Further, he was in the aviation service during the war, and so had the uniform ready to hand. You couldn't make anybody believe that he hasn't been the Masquer all the time!"

"Of course," and the chief nodded perplexedly. "It'd be a clear case—only you call me in and say that he wasn't the Masquer! D—n it, Fell, this thing has my goat!"

"What's Maillard's story?" struck in Ben Chacherre.

"He denies the whole thing," said the worried chief. "According to his story, which sounded straight the way he tells it, he meant to pull off the joke on his friends and was dressing in the Masquer's costume when he heard the shots. He claims that the shots startled him and made him change back. He swears that he had not entered the other room at all, except in his masquerade clothes. He says the murderer must have been the real Masquer. It's likely enough, because all young Maillard's crowd knew about the party that was to be held in that room during the Comus ball—"

"No matter," said Fell, coldly. "Chief, this is an open and shut case; the boy was bound to lie. That he killed his father was an accident, of course, but none the less it did take place."

"The boy's a wreck this minute." The chief held a match to his unlighted cigar. "But you say that he ain't the original Masquer?"

"No!" Fell spoke quietly. "The original Masquer was another person, and had nothing to do with the present case. This information is confidential and between ourselves."

I. The Birth of Jesus (vv. 1-7).

1. Time of (vv. 1-3). It was at a time when the Jews were coming under the Roman power. It was a most propitious time for the introduction of the gospel. The whole world was under one rule, making it possible for ministers to go from place to place easily and without molestation.

2. Place of (vv. 4-6). Bethlehem, as the prophet had foretold 700 years before (Micah 5:2). God moved the emperor to enforce the decree of taxation in time to cause Mary to be at Bethlehem.

3. Circumstances of (v. 7). His surroundings were of the most humble sort. The Almighty Creator condescended to take upon himself humanity—to be born in a manger, becoming the poorest of the poor that none might be hindered from coming to Him.

II. The Birth of Jesus Announced (vv. 8-20).

1. To Whom (vv. 8, 9). The shepherds who were watching over their flocks by night. The glorious gospel message was first given to laboring men.

2. By Whom (v. 9). The first gospel sermon was preached by the angel of the Lord. The angels have part in making known the gospel to lost men. These glorious beings no doubt deeply sympathize with fallen, sin-cursed men.

3. The Nature of the Message (vv. 10-14). It was good tidings of great joy. It was good tidings because the way of salvation was about to be opened for all—Jew and Gentile. So glorious was this news that a multitude of the heavenly host accompanied it with a song of praise. It is through Jesus Christ that God's kindness and good will are made known to man.

4. The Shepherds Witnessing (vv. 15-20). They made a prompt investigation of the angel's message.

III. The Child Jesus Growing (vv. 40-52).

Jesus Christ was divine, but His deity did not interfere with His development as a human being. The processes of his physical, mental and spiritual growth were the same as those of any normal human being.

1. Jesus Tarrying Behind at Jerusalem (vv. 40-43). At the age of twelve years a Jewish child took his place as a worshiper in the temple, for he was considered a "child of the law." Being conscious of His mission when His mother and Joseph were returning from attendance at the Passover, Jesus tarried behind to enter the temple and inquire into the meaning of the ordinances of God's house.

2. Jesus Found in the Temple (vv. 44-47). When His mother and Joseph had gone some distance on their journey they perceived that Jesus was missing and sought for Him among their kinsfolk and acquaintances. Not finding Him there they returned to Jerusalem, where they found Him in the temple. (1) He was "sitting" (v. 46), showing that He was no passing visitor or sightseer. He was perfectly at home in His Father's house. (2) He was "hearing" (v. 46). He was hearing the teachers of God's Word. This shows that He was eager to learn God's will. (3) He asked questions (v. 46). His growing mind was inquisitive. It more than received what was taught; it inquired after. (4) He answered questions (v. 47). His answers showed great wisdom, such as to astonish those who heard Him. Yet we should not surmise that He was consciously displaying His wisdom. It was not an exhibition of His divine wisdom, but the expression of the workings of a perfect human mind suffused by the Holy Spirit.

3. Mary's Complaint (vv. 48-50). She remonstrated with Him for His behavior. To this He replied in a dignified, yet tender manner. He made no apology, showing that He was more than the son of Mary.

4. Jesus' Obedience (v. 51). Though He was fully conscious of His divine being and mission, He lived a life of filial obedience.

5. Jesus' Development (v. 52). (1) Mental. He "increased in wisdom." (2) Physical. He "increased in stature." (3) Spiritual. He "increased in favor with God and man."

Spoiled Diamonds.

Among the crown jewels of the Hapsburgs were two large diamonds of ruby tint which were always regarded as especially valuable and whenever the royal jewels were placed on exhibition these stones were under special guard. It was necessary some time ago to dispose of the jewels, and as they were being prepared for exhibition, prior to being offered for sale, they were put through a wash which unfortunately removed the color of the precious stones and left them perfectly white. Instead of demanding a fabulous price as ruby diamonds, they were sold simply as white stones.—Chicago Journal.

Stearns Electric Paste Co.,

Dear Sirs: Mr. Robert T. Donnell of Auburntown, Tenn., came in our store the other day and wanted something to kill rats, so I sold him a box Stearns Rat Paste. And he put some paste on six biscuits that night and the next morning he found fifty-four big rats. And the second night he put out four more biscuits with paste on them, and the second morning he found seventeen more rats, making a total of seventy-one rats in two nights, and there were lots more that he did not find.

This is some big rat tale, but, nevertheless, it is so. Just thought would write to let you know that your rat paste is good.

INDIANA BREVITIES

Indianapolis.—A total of more than $10,000 may have to be returned to about thirty Indiana counties by as many county auditors as a result of a decision by Robert F. Murray, judge of Superior court at Muncie, that Joel F. Benefield, formerly auditor of Madison county, was not entitled to extra pay from the county for making real estate transfer records, but that such service was paid for out of his regular salary. The state board of accounts has charged against the auditors the sums which they received as extra pay. Among the charges are some on which Governor McCray and William G. Oliver, state auditor, had proceeded along a theory which now is seen to be at variance with the decision of the court.

Noblesville.—At a meeting here several hundred Hamilton county taxpayers perfected an organization, the purpose of which is the reduction of taxes. The convention agreed that it would discourage the signing of any more petitions for either hard-surfaced or gravel roads; that it would encourage every remonstrance that was circulated for a road; that it would urge the county commissioners to dismiss all pending petitions for highways, and that road construction of every kind in Hamilton county be suspended for at least three years.

Danville.—Because the county commissioners refused to allow $150 for their services at the spring primaries, two election commissioners of Hendricks county have declined to act in that capacity at the November election. Each of the election commissioners filed a bill for $150 for his services and the county commissioners cut the bill to $50, which amount was allowed. The members of the election commission board refused to accept this amount and both members offered resignations.

Noblesville.—A poison plant survey of several counties in central Indiana has been completed by Prof. A. A. Hansen of the agricultural extension department of Purdue university and John A. Gilkey, Hamilton county agent. An interesting result was the discovery of white snakeroot and water hemlock on farms near Carmel. Professor Hansen gave out the following statement concerning these poisonous weeds: "White snakeroot causes a disease among sheep and cattle that Lafayette.—Objection to the tax levy for the city of Lafayette for the coming year, as fixed by the city council, has been made by fourteen business men, who have petitioned the state board of tax commissioners to review the levy. The council set the tax rate at 92 cents on the $100 and, according to the petitioners, the amount of money this rate will raise is more than enough to meet expenses if the city government were economically administered.

Terre Haute.—Officers elected at the closing session of the annual convention in Terre Haute of the American Legion Auxiliary of Indiana were: Mrs. I. M. Downey, of Wabash, president; Mrs. Wilma Farmer, of Indianapolis, first vice-president; Mrs. Clarence Hughel, of Indianapolis, second vice-president; Mrs. Hazel Workman, of Indianapolis, secretary; Mrs. Helen Green, of Garrett, treasurer; Mrs. W. A. Stevens, of Columbus, historian; Mrs. C. A. Salm, Rockport, chaplain.

Indianapolis.—Latest attendance figures received in the office of the superintendent of schools of Indianapolis show the number of pupils in the elementary grades now to be 38,896 and in the high schools, 8,365. This makes the total attendance thus far 47,261 as compared with a total attendance of 49,879 for the entire year ending in June, 1922. The normal increase for a year is expected.

Indianapolis.—A tax levy of 93.5 cents on each hundred dollars of taxable property was made by the board of school commissioners. This levy, based on the estimated assessed valuation of property in the Indianapolis school district, which is $597,960,900, would provide $5,590,934.41 for requirements of the city schools as set out in the annual budget prepared by the business director of the schools.

Indianapolis.—Sixty-nine cases of diphtheria have been reported to the city board of health since September 11, the opening of the schools, Dr. Herman G. Morgan, secretary of the board, said. Many cases are developing in children under school age, Doctor [illegible] said. He urged that [illegible] throat cultures to be taken when a child develops a sore throat.

Gary.—That a hearing to be held later will shake Lake county to its foundation in both county and city circles, was the assertion of Dixon H. Bynum, assistant district attorney, representing the federal government in the case against William M. Dunn, city judge, and Bias Lucas, Gary attorney, who are charged with conspiracy to violate the prohibition law. Before Dunn and Lucas were held to the federal grand jury at Indianapolis, under bond of $5,000 each, the assistant district attorney warned that if any of the witnesses for the government were intimidated or if any attempt were made to intimidate them, the government would take prompt action. He said the city court records were not worth the paper they were written on.

Terre Haute.—Perry Faulkner, of Shelbyville, commander of Victory Post No. 70, was elected state commander of the American Legion at the fourth annual convention in Terre Haute of the American Legion, department of Indiana. Faulkner received 280 votes. Everett Gardner of Monticello was second with 172 votes and Mead Vestal of Noblesville was third with 90 votes. Other officers are: Charles Hunt, Jeffersonville, re-elected first vice commander; Dr. Whitefield Bowers, Michigan City, second vice commander; Frank H. Henley, Wabash, re-elected adjutant; the Rev. George W. Allison, Indianapolis, chaplain; Scott Shields, Brownstown, re-elected sergeant-at-arms. Michigan City was selected as the convention city next year.

Indianapolis.—The cost of providing Indiana National Guard protection for the property of the Rowland-Power Consolidated Collieries company in the Staunton coal field and other Indiana coal mining property last August will be about $50,000, the adjutant general of Indiana estimated. He said: "The bills still are coming in and I can't tell the cost exactly. I estimated about $60,000 at first, but it will be a little less than that. The pay roll amounted to about $30,000; transportation $16,000, and there have been other groups of bills aggregating $3,000 or $4,000."

Muncie.—Muncie citizens have turned the clock back 40 years. Recently wagons went from house to house dumping loads of wood in cellars. Farmers have found a good market for wood and are hauling it to town in trucks and wagons. A handle factory also is doing a thriving business. The public has gone on a "buyers' strike" against the high price of coal, and is preparing to burn wood. Muncie coal yards have supplies on hand for domestic users, but many intend to rely on wood and natural gas. is called the trembles on account of the characteristic symptoms."

Indianapolis.—The state board of tax commissioners conferred with Governor McCray and William G. Oliver, auditor of state, over the fixing of a tax rate to meet state expenses for the coming year. In view of a reduction, of approximately $500,000,000 in the valuation of land and property in the state this year, it is regarded as certain that the tax rate will be raised from 4 to 6 cents on the $100 of taxables. The state tax rate now is 25 cents. An increase in the rate will be necessary, it is believed, to meet the state budgets, even if they remain the same as last year.

Anderson.—Sheriff Lewis had guards on duty on the outside of the county jail at Anderson every night for two weeks because of fearing a jail delivery. The jail has a number of prisoners held on serious charges and word reached the authorities of plans for an attempted delivery. A rope was recently found hanging from a cell, it is supposed for the purpose of receiving material from outside to escape.

Muncie.—The biggest tomato pack of many years is being put up by the several canning factories at Muncie, and the plants expect to be busy at least until the middle of October, provided a severe frost does not come too soon. It had been thought that a coal shortage might cut short the output of canning plants, but all now have sufficient fuel for the remainder of the season, it is said.

Bedford.—Pink Bugh, fifty, night deputy town marshal of Oolitic, five miles north of Bedford on the Dixie highway, was shot to death in front of the movie theater, where he had been called to disperse a crowd annoying the audience. He arrested a young man named Cobb. A brother of the latter, Speed Cobb, is said to have shot the marshal five times. The officer died almost instantly.

HAD REAL CAUSE FOR GRIEF

Small Boy's Distress Had a Whole Lot More Than Mere Sympathy as a Basis.

A lad in Washington got a job that didn't at all please him—shoveling the snow from the sidewalk in front of his house. There was a good bit of ground to cover. After about two hours' toil he began to cry.

"What's the matter, son?" asked a sympathetic neighbor, as he came upon the scene.

"A tramp came along and stole the shovel from the boy next door," explained the lad between sobs.

"Well, son," continued the neighbor, "it's a fine thing to be sympathetic, but you mustn't worry so over other people's affairs."

"It ain't that," added the boy, "I am crying because he didn't steal my shovel, too."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

PRAYER CAME FROM HEART

Under the Circumstances, There Can Be Little Doubt Sambo Was Sincere in His Supplication.

Representative Christopherson of South Dakota tells a good story about a darky who was short of meat at home and selected his pastor's smokehouse as a likely place to get a nice ham. As he was leaving with a big one under his arm the pastor suddenly appeared before him and said:

"Why, Sambo, what are you doing in my smokehouse at this time of night?"

To which the trembling darky replied: "Ah suh, Ah just come in to pray, suh."

Whereupon the pastor said: "If that is the purpose of this visit here, then you just get down and pray."

Thereupon the darky sank on his knees, raised his eyes and hands to heaven and offered up this prayer: "Oh, Lord, I pray that you now promptly dismiss us so that we may depart in peace."—Exchange.

Parrot Got Busy.

Johnny played with his little friends next door, where they had a loquacious parrot.

When mother wanted Johnny she would telephone and the message would be shouted out the back door, "Johnny, your mother wants you." Whereupon the lad would go home.

One day, hearing the familiar words, the boy trotted back to his own house and reported to mother. Imagine his surprise when she said, "I didn't call you."

The parrot had learned the combination, "Johnny, your mother wants you," and sent the boy home.

A UNION OF INTEREST TO WOMEN

Healthy Housewife---Happy Home

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Has Helped Form Many

For the ailing, half-sick housewife such a union is impossible. Often times even the slightest form of housework cannot be accomplished. Yet the work must be done.

Many women struggle along for years suffering from some form of female trouble that make their lives miserable and their homes far from happy.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has helped thousands of just such women regain their health and strength. Just give your thought to the following letters and remember that the women who wrote these letters knew how they felt before taking the Vegetable Compound and again afterwards. It helped them—let it help you.

Had Nervous Spells

Horatio, Ark.—"I had nervous spells and awful bad feelings. My right side and my back hurt me all the time and I had been going down in health for six or seven years. For three years I had not been able to do my work without help. I weighed only 95 pounds when my husband's mother persuaded me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Now I heartily recommend it to all suffering women, as I have gained weight and health. I can do all my work, anything I want to do."—Mrs. JIM REARICK, Horatio, Arkansas.

Reading, Pa.—"I was a nervous wreck and could hardly do my housework. I always had to have help or I would never have got it done. Through the advice of friends I have been taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for my nerves and Lydia E. Pinkham's Blood Medicine for my blood and I am feeling fine and doing my work all alone. I can recommend these medicines to any one, for they certainly helped me. I suffered for five years and Lydia E. Pinkham's medicines pulled me through."—Mrs. WALTER U. STOYER, 1218 Mulberry St., Reading, Pa.

Recommends the Vegetable Compound

New Orleans, La.—"I have found relief from my troubles by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I praise it wherever I go. I could not do my work as it should be done for I would sometimes have to lie down because of the pains I had. A friend induced me to take your Vegetable Compound and I have got great results from it. I keep house and am able to do all my own work. I recommend your Vegetable Compound to my friends who have troubles similar to mine."—Mrs. T. FOECKLER, 1915 N. Derbigny St., New Orleans, La.

Descendants of Mary's Lamb.

Col. Thomas Powell of Columbus, Ohio, veteran of the Civil war and brother of the famous Gen. Eugene Powell, is the proud owner of "Lawnmower," the only living descendant of Mary's little lamb. The original Mary was Mary Sawyer of Sterling, Mass., who was eight years old at the time celebrated by the poem in 1814. The immortal verses, by the way, were written by John Roulston.—From the Argonaut.

Canada's First Railroad.

The first railroad in Canada was the one built between Laprairie and St. Johns, Quebec, and opened for traffic in July, 1836. This railway line was established by some prominent Montreal business men, and the railroad was constructed of wooden rails, horsepower being employed during the first year. In 1837 the wooden rails were replaced by iron rails, and the horses by a steam engine. The railway was known as the "Champlain and St. Lawrence Railway company." The Champlain & St. Lawrence Railway company received its charter in 1832—ninety years ago.

YOU MAY NOT BELIEVE THIS

But, If True, This Young Lady Is Very Evidently Not in the Class of Modern "Flappers."

A country correspondent of an Indiana weekly newspaper, who disclaimed being either a pessimist or reformer, recently wrote as follows: "The other day a man and his daughter from near Danville, Ky., passed through our town on their way to a nearby village. They expected to be met at the train by a relative, but he was late, so they had to wait for him for four or five hours. The daughter was a young woman of seventeen, but still wore her hair in curls. We were especially impressed by the natural girlishness and sweet modesty of the young woman. She was refined, too, both in manners and dress. Her father apologized for her bashfulness. There's nothing else to say about this little incident except that it is a rare and beautiful thing to hear a father apologize for the modesty of a daughter of seventeen summers."—Indianapolis News.

Paradoxical but True.

"Covering the Subject"

Old Si Chestnut says: "An advertisement should be like a woman's dress—long enough to cover the subject, but short enough to be interesting."

All right. Here goes. Our subject: A check on our bank is better than a U. S. Treasury Note. Why? Because, if you loose your Treasury Note by fire, theft, hold-up or accident, it is gone for good, that's all. But if the same accident should happen to a check on our bank, you can stop payment and have a new check issued. Is that short enough to be interesting?

Report of Eloise Bowman

Editor St. Joe News:

You ask for a report of my trip to Indianapolis, where I was DeKalb County's representative at the ceremonies for the laying of the corner stone at the Riley Hospital for children, the worlds greatest hospital for poor children This honor came to me through Mr. Green, our County Superintendent of schools, and I feel sure it was not intended so much for me personally as to our St. Joe Schools, for many times has Mr. Green commented on the excellent condition of our school and our splendid staff of teachers. And so in this public way I want to thank him for the honor to our school and the compliment to myself, which enabled me to have the most wonderful time of my life.

We were asked to report at the Claypool Hotel Saturday at 10:30 a. m., which we did in a downpour of rain. We were escorted to parlor B on the second floor and each girl was asked to write her name and county on a small square of parchment. These squares, together with cards to visit Riley's home and banquet tickets for ourselves and escorts, we kept until later in the day. We had been asked to dress in white, so on account of the weather most of us dressed in the Hotel, and what a beautiful hotel it is. Then at 11:30 a. m. we girls were invited into the Riley banquet room, also on second floor. We were seated at tables and our pictures taken. Then the doors were reopened and our escorts (mostly parents) and other guests were invited in, seated and another picture taken of all of us. I wish I could describe the beauty of this banquet room, named for Mr. Riley. It is decorated in rose and gold with a painting of Mr. Riley and many quotations from his poems inscribed upon the walls. The one over our table was:

"Let us fold away our fears
And put by our foolish tears
And through all the coming years
Just be glad."

An elegant banquet was served to about 500 people with fine music by the Lincoln Orchestra. Mr. William Fortune was chairman. He said, "Perhaps the rain has shunted aside the sunshine that should have been over all the program today like a benediction, but again Riley may be said to speak and say;

"There ain't no use to grumble an'complain,
Its just as cheap an'easy to rejoice;
When God sorts out the weather an'sends rain
Why, rain's my choice."

And so in that spirit the banquet went on. Bishop Jos. R. Francis gave the invocation. Wonderful speeches were made by the chairman, Mr. Fortune; Toastmaster L. C. Huesmann; Governor Warren McCray; Mr. J. W. Fester, from state University; Marcus Dickey, Riley's biographer and Wm. R. Hough, personal friend and interpreter of Riley's poems also a number of State Board of Tax Com.; Dr. Matthew F. Smith, pastor of First Presbyterian Church, also spoke. The chairman said "Many banquets have been given in this hotel but to me this is the most wonderful of all for these white clad girls, our guests of honor, with their escorts, represent every county in Indiana and it is a get together, get acquainted meeting." The banquet was made especially interesting by the presence of Mrs. Mary Alice [illegible], the original of the poem "Little Orphan Annie." She was a [illegible] [illegible] for laying of the corner stone right there in the banquet room. Mr. Thomas Riley Marshall then made the principal speech of the day. It was a wonderful address given in a wonderful way. People who were familiar with his power of oratory said he was at his best for he was a personal friend of Riley's and a lover of all children. Dr. Lafayette Page then took charge of the ceremonies and asked that the corner stone box be brought to the room.

Quite by chance the attendant gave the box to me and I carried it to Dr. Page. The box is made of bronze, is 18 in. long, 7 in. wide and 8 in. deep. Then Dr. Page called the counties and we responded by dropping our squares of parchment in the box. A bronze trowel presented by President and Mrs. Harding will seal the box. Besides our county parchments and some names of state clubs and organisations the following articles were deposited: Two copies of the official program, the front pages of Indianapolis newspapers, Riley's last book "Songs of Friendship" dedicated to Young E. Allison, editor and author of Louisville; a letter from Mr. Allison saying he would be unable to attend the ceremonies because of illness, and a copy of the Riley Hospital campaign booklet.

Many prominent women were present including Mrs. Marshall and Mrs. Albert J. Beveridge. Favors were given to all the guests and we girls were given a beautiful book of Riley's "A Hoosier Romance." After this we were taken to Mr. Riley's home on Lockerbie St. This beautiful home on a quaint old street is full of interesting things. On our way home we visited Greenfield, 18 miles from Indianapolis, the birthplace and home of Riley.

We have copies of all the speeches made in the banquet hall including Mr. Marshall's. We will leave them temporarily with the editor and if you are interested it will be worth your time to read them.

Eloise Bowman.

American Farm Bureau

Colorado Extension Workers at Midsummer Conference at Fort Lewis School of Agriculture.

The Colorado State Farm Bureau, through its county farm bureaus, is closely co-operating with the extension service of the Colorado Agricultural college in its educational work among the farmers. The value of this co-operation is demonstrated by the success in counties where the county farm bureaus are best organized for community work as brought out at the midsummer conference of the extension workers.

DAIRY CO-OPERATIVE PLAN IS BIG WINNER

Goal of 6,000 Signers of Contract Passed on September 1 by Committee of Nine.

More than half of the milk of the 27 counties of the Chicago zone will be marketed co-operatively, as the result of the success in the re-organization of the Chicago Milk Producers' Co-Operative Marketing company. The re-organization plan is based on a contract devised by the committee of nine, appointed by E. B. Heaton, director of dairy marketing for the American Farm Bureau federation. According to the preliminary reports in the hands of the committee on September 1, the minimum of 6,000 signers which it was necessary to secure on that date in order to make the contract binding, was exceeded by at least 847, with many locals yet to report. Workers declare that the success of their campaign puts a new era in the business and indicates that before long harmony will reign between the organizations in this section. The campaign succeeded despite the bitter prejudices of some factions and the vigorous opposition from some milk dealers.

E. B. HEATON
Director of Dairy Marketing.

The counties affected are: Winnebago, Boone, McHenry, Lake, Ogle, DeKalb, Kane, Cook, DuPage, Whiteside, Lee, Kendall, Will and Kankakee in Illinois; Waukesha, Green, Rock, Walworth, Racine and Kenosha in Wisconsin; Lake, Porter, LaPorte, Jasper, Starke, Fulton and Wabash in Indiana.

The percentage of sign-up was strongest in Wisconsin. Without a single exception, every one of the 245 producers delivering milk to Beloit, Wis., signed. At Elkhorn, Wis., never organized before, 300 out of 359 patrons of the leading dairys were signed. Only three men still remained outside at Grays Lake, Ill. In Winnebago county, Illinois, where the Rockford, Pecatonica, Seward and Durand locals [illegible] producers, only [illegible] were reported not signed.

[illegible]

The success of the Chicago campaign is of interest to producers and consumers not only in the Chicago district, but everywhere. The new contract contains unique features which lead many students of dairy marketing to believe that it will find application in a national way. E. B. Heaton, the farm bureau dairy marketing director, who has been largely responsible for the success of the plan, declares that the establishment of four pools within the main pool and the deduction of a small sum from the price in the inner district to be added to the lower price in the outer district in order to protect the fluid milk market from over-supply is essential to co-operative dairy marketing success in any section similar to the Chicago territory.

Mr. Heaton is secretary of the farmer's dairy marketing committee of eleven, and will propose that the essentials of the Chicago plan be adopted by the national committee.

BOYS AND GIRLS ARE IOWA FAIR WINNERS

Clifford Benson of La Moille, Iowa, Wins Grand Championship With His Calf.

Boys' and girls' club demonstrations and exhibits were main features at state and county fairs this year. In a number of states the county fairs are appropriating definite amounts to carry on this work and stimulate an interest in it.

One of the outstanding winners who just came to light at the Iowa State fair is Clifford Benson of LaMoille, Iowa, who showed the grand champion calf, a Hereford. With a class of 867, it took the judge all day to decide on young Benson's calf, which was a purebred named Beau Repeater. This gave Marshall county, Iowa, for the third consecutive year, the grand championship of one of the leading beef producing states of the nation. Marshall county is so elated over the winning with competition of 366 calves that they have secured funds to send the winning steers and boys to the Nebraska State fair.

The reserve grand championship went to an Angus calf shown by Dean Dodder of Letts, Iowa. The club boys and girls are showing, in addition to calves, around 400 swine and one thousand head of poultry. Over eight thousand dollars in prizes is being offered to the winners by the Iowa State fair.

In the state of Minnesota, Mr. T. A. Erickson, state club leader, estimates that the average appropriation of the 80 county fairs is $350, or a total of $28,000.

In New York state the premiums, prizes and incidentals provided by town and county fairs, banks, schools, farm bureaus and committees totals $14,500.

In the Hawkeye state, the assistant director of extension, P. C. Staff, estimates that at least $20,000 is being given in county prizes to boys and girls this year.

At the recent Central States fair held at Aurora, Illinois, Miss Frances Muth of Elburn, a thirteen-year-old girl, who has been in club work three years, won first and third place. She also entered her pigs in the open [illegible]

HONEYCOMB COILS IN CONVERTING RECEIVER

Third Regenerative Circuit Arrangement Is by Electrostatic Coupling.

In making a receiving set over into a regenerative circuit, the DeForest honeycomb coils are very well adapted to a circuit arrangement as shown in Figure N. One coil is used as a primary, a second coil as a secondary, and a third as a tickler or plate inductance.

When mounted in a set the secondary is placed in the center and the primary and tickler coils on the outside in such a manner that the coupling between the primary and the secondary can be varied.

The greatest advantage derived from the use of honeycomb coils is the ability to cover the entire range of wave length with very small dead-end losses. With the same receiving set the coils used for receiving long wave trans-Atlantic stations can be plugged out, a smaller set of coils plugged in, and amateur stations picked up efficiently.

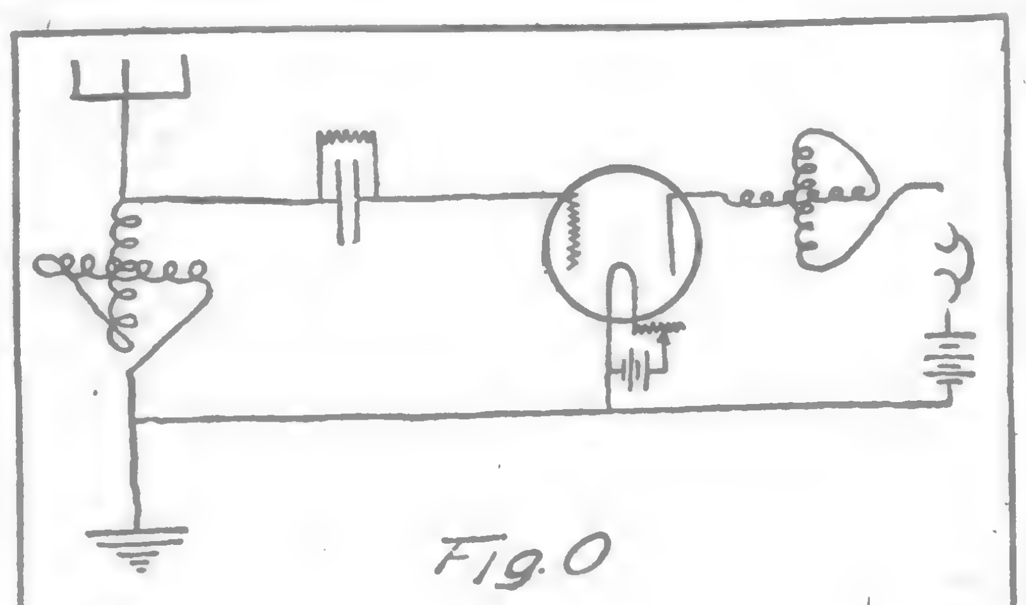

Fig. O

This ability tends to make this particular type of receiver the closest approach to a universal wave length receiver that can be made.

The regenerative circuit arrangements already shown feed back from the plate circuit to the grid circuit in one of two ways: First, conductively, as in the circuit called the DeForest Ultra-Audion circuit, and second, by inductive coupling as in the circuit which makes use of the tickler coil. There is a third method of coupling—electrostatic, by which the circuits between which the energy is to be transferred are connected by condensers.

In a circuit in which the energy is small and the frequency is high, that is, short wave length, the coupling condenser need be of only a very small capacity. The elements of a vacuum tube have a capacity with respect to each other. Some of the most efficient of the short wave regenerative receivers used today depend on the capacity between the elements of the vacuum tube to furnish the necessary electrostatic capacity between the plate and the grid circuits to feed energy from one of these circuits to the other.

Figure O shows a simple single tube regenerative receiver for short wave work that depends on the electrostatic capacity between the elements of the tube for the coupling between the plate and grid circuits. A variometer "A" in the antenna circuit is used for tuning. Another variometer "B" in series with the plate is used for tuning the plate circuit to the same natural period as that of the received [illegible]. This circuit is sometimes called the tuned plate circuit method of [illegible].

There are two tuned oscillating circuits in the receiver. [illegible]

[illegible] and a circuit of the general arrangements of that shown in the diagram, an amateur can get excellent results. Any of the standard variometers on the market can be used for the grid and plate variometers "A" and "B."

For those who wish to build a set of this type, a more detailed diagram of connections is shown in Figure P. The antenna series condenser is one of the 21-plate size. An "A" battery potentiometer is shown in the circuit for those who wish to use a soft detector tube.

ELECTRICAL SHOP AND RADIO

Establishment That Does General Electrical Work Has Big Advantage Over Others.

One of the strongest arguments possessed by the electrical store selling radio supplies is the expert service it can offer, says Burton Millar, in a comprehensive article in Radio Merchandising. All sorts and descriptions of apparatus and parts can be put in stock by any store in any line of business and that is exactly what is being done in every city in the country, but the establishment which makes a specialty of doing general electrical work—wiring for light, power, etc., and carrying a stock of electrical goods of every sort—has a distinct advantage over the store which added a radio department to other lines of merchandise entirely different in character.

It is virtually important, however, that the availability of this expert service be broadcast to the field it is desired to reach. Publicity is the only thing that will do it. The public must be told. Not once, but repeatedly, and in every possible way.

It is not enough to have a card in the display window announcing: "Our electrical experts will be glad to give you any information or assistance in installing or operating your radio outfit." Or to run an occasional small ad in the local newspapers. Or to have a car card in the local street cars. Or to distribute small folders through the mails to a local list.

All of these methods are good—if you keep persistently at it! There is no single quality of advertising so absolutely essential as persistence. If you do not concede this you are simply ignoring the experience of all successful advertisers of all time.

If the radio department is to be built up and made a substantial part of your store's business it is essential that the public be told where it can find this superior service, tested apparatus and expert counsel.

A talk given recently at Schenectady by Dr. Marconi was enjoyed by a crowd of 3,000 persons who had assembled in Washington park, Albany, for the purpose.

LESSON FOR OCTOBER 15

THE MINISTRY OF JOHN THE BAPTIST

LESSON TEXT—Luke 3:1-22.

GOLDEN TEXT—Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.—Matt. 3:2.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Matt. 11:2-19; Phil. 2:5-11.

PRIMARY TOPIC—What John Said About Jesus.

JUNIOR TOPIC—John Preaching and Baptizing.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—A Fearless Reformer.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Repentance: What It Is and What It Does.

I. The Degeneracy of the Times (vv. 1, 2).

The Jews had sunk to a very low level of civil, moral and religious life. Luke carefully enumerates the civil and religious rulers in order to show the profligacy of the times, and therefore the need of a messenger to call the people back to God and virtue. Herod, the son of the Great, was a murderer. Annas and Caiaphas were corrupt ecclesiastical rulers.

II. The Nature of John's Ministry (vv. 3-6).

In the wilderness he underwent a discipline which fitted him for his task. Out of the wilderness he flashed forth preaching the baptism of repentence for the remission of sins (v. 3). This ministry is declared to be a fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy. The message was described as one calling upon the nation to prepare for the coming of the Messiah. This preparation was presented under the figure of a monarch of the East about to make a journey. A servant was sent before to prepare the highway. Valleys needed to be filled, mountains and hills needed to be lowered, crooked places needed to be made straight and rough places needed to be made smooth. Today before the nations will receive Christ the valleys need to be filled with righteous deeds, the exceeding high mountains of sin and iniquity need to be brought low, the crooked dealings of the business world must be straightened out, and the rough ways of nations and individuals must be smoothed out. Men must repent of their sins before they can receive Christ.

III. The Content of John's Message (vv. 7-18).

1. Denunciation of Sin (vv. 7, 8). He called them "a generation of vipers." This shows that he charged them with deceitfulness and wickedness. Knowing the subtle hypocrisy of these Jews, he demanded evidence of their sincerity—the genuineness of their repentance was to be demonstrated by their works.

2. Announcement of Judgment (v. 9). He declared that the axe was laid at the root of the tree and that the tree not bringing forth fruit was to be hewn down and cast into the fire. John made it very plain that for their sins they should be called into judgment. Paul's preaching of a judgment to come made Felix tremble (Acts 24:25).

3. Instructions to the Inquirers (vv. 10-14). (1) The people (vv. 10, 11). Each man was to turn from his besetting sin and show love and kindness to his fellow men. Clothing and food were to be given those who had need. They were to turn from a life of selfishness and greed and do unto others as they would be done by. (2) Publicans (vv. 12, 13). These taxgatherers who were guilty of greed and oppression were not asked to give up their occupation, but to exact only that which was appointed by law. (3) The soldiers (v. 14). These were likely the policemen of that day—at least men on military duty. He told them to extort money from no man, to accuse none falsely, and to be content with their wages. To all these classes he made it clear that they should henceforth perform their duty from a motive of love instead of selfishness and greed.

4. Testimony to Jesus (vv. 15-18). The people were musing in their hearts as to whether John was indeed the Messiah. When John perceived this he with fine humility declared that his mission was so lowly in comparison with Christ's that he would be unworthy to perform the menial act of a slave in loosing the latchet of His shoes. John baptized with water, but Christ, he declared, would baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire.

IV. John's Imprisonment (vv. 19, 20).

[illegible] reproof of Herod for his [illegible] and other sins John [illegible]. The preacher of [illegible] must become a [illegible] prophets are [illegible] the world, even [illegible] or beheaded.

Important to All Women Readers of This Paper

Thousands upon thousands of women have kidney or bladder trouble and never suspect it.

Women's complaints often prove to be nothing else but kidney trouble, or the result of kidney or bladder disease.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition, they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

You may suffer pain in the back, headache and loss of ambition.

Poor health makes you nervous, irritable and maybe despondent; it makes any one so.

But hundreds of women claim that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, by restoring health to the kidneys, proved to be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

Many send for a sample bottle to see what Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder medicine, will do for them. By enclosing ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., you may receive sample size bottle by parcel post. You can purchase medium and large size bottles at all drug stores.—Advertisement.

The Reading of the Riddle

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

> "Dear, was it really you or I?
> In truth the riddle's ill to read,
> So many are the deaths we die
> Before we can be dead indeed."
> —W. E. Henley.

THE town of Willow Creek lies at the junction of a rivulet of that name, with the Big Muddy. But the people of that community being born scoffers, have changed the name of the Big Muddy in common parlance to "Mud Crick," and, transformed by the alchemy of popular depreciation, the name of the town itself has shriveled into "Willer Creek." It might have been something of a town, as towns go in the West, but instead of pulling with his neighbors for the success of the town, each of its founders spent his time making fun of the pretensions of others. When there was talk on the part of "old man" Mead, the primeval postmaster, of securing the government land office for Willow Creek, the Indian trader, and the saloonkeeper, and the blacksmith, made great sport of the old man's ambition. A few years later, when civilization had crowded in with a hotel, a lumber yard, a new saloon, and a barber shop, someone spoke of starting a newspaper; but the laugh that went up from Willow Creek was the only unanimity that greeted Editor McCray when his back was turned. But the newspaper came, and so did the people, and they kept coming, until, when the "boom" of the later eighties struck Kansas, it found Willow Creek with about two thousand scoffing inhabitants.

But, in one way or another, the "boom" seemed to bring wealth to Willow Creek. And with wealth, came some attempts at the organization of polite society. There were innumerable young real estate agents, young doctors, young lawyers, and clerks, all from the East, in the village; and these, with the daughters of the early settlers and such friends as they chanced to make in the high school, constituted the aristocracy of the town. It was a vulnerable aristocracy, and the scoffers made sad havoc with it.

It was said of Flora McCray, who went to boarding school and came back, timid, retiring, and distinctly unsocial, that, "She needn't hold herself so high. If her father would only pay back the money he stole in the school land fraud she would be as common as anybody." But the girl paid no heed to these rumors, if she heard them. She quietly filled her small sphere, bounded on one side by her meek-voiced mother and her busy father, on another side by her church and her "church social," on a third side by a very brief glimpse of a very big world and her memory of it, and on the fourth side by occasional day dreams and night thoughts, pretty much the same as those which come to any young girl of good health, good spirits, and twenty-one years, who has never had a sweetheart.

As the reaction, caused by the decadence of real estate prices set in, Willow Creek became poorer. As the young men, who paid for the orchestras, and halls, and flowers, gradually left town, the young women, who formerly frequented receptions, parties, and balls, were seen more and more often at the "church socials." After a two years' ineffectual struggle Willow Creek gave it up, the town could no longer support two branches of society, and the "church crowd" and the "dance crowd" merged into one.

When it was announced that the entire social body of Willow Creek was going out to Robinson's for a "taffy pull" one Saturday night, the rest of Willow Creek laughed. The town people sneered at the young women who had planned the party, and intimated that the night ride out to Robinson's and back was a heroic measure; and they laughed at old man Robinson and his family for tolerating people who would snub them if they came to town, and lastly they laughed at the young men who would have to pay the livery bills.

Saturday morning, John Howard, Mr. McCray's partner in the stock business, came up from the farm on Dry Creek, and after going over some details of business, McCray asked his partner to Sunday dinner, as was his custom, when the young man was in town, and the invitation was accepted. During the "boom" Howard had made money. He had mingled with what is known as the "swell set" of Willow Creek, and though not a favorite at the flood of the "boom," the very fact that he had the social instinct, made him a necessity in society at its ebb.

Soon after leaving his partner's office, he had learned of the plans for the "taffy pull," that evening. He was urged to go, and finding that all the "rigs" were full, and that all the girls of his "set" were provided with escorts, in a moment of despairing inspiration the young man sent a note to his partner's daughter, asking for "the pleasure of her company." His invitation was accepted, and late that afternoon, Flora McCray stepped into a buggy with the first beau she had ever had, and headed a long procession for Robinson's.

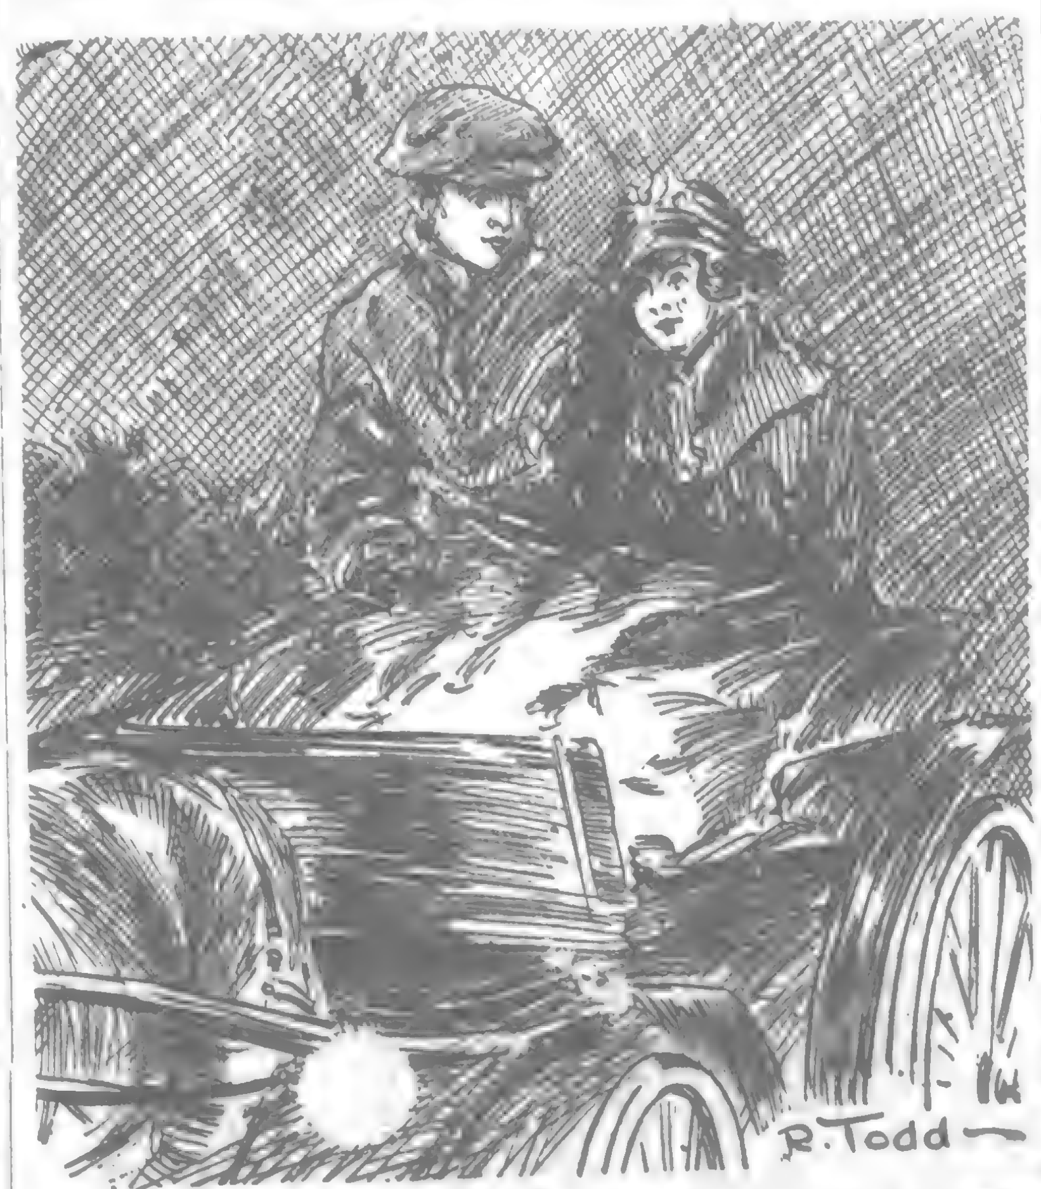
* * * * * * *

Someone had stopped the clock that night [illegible] it was nearly midnight, when the "taffy pull" at Robinson's broke up. As Flora McCray sat alone in the Robinson parlor waiting to hear the grinding of wheels across the graveled path, that would herald her escort's buggy, she went over the evening's impressions in her mind. She decided that it had been a very pleasant evening. She had never before found herself surrounded by the masterful attentions of a young man. She was pleased with his business-like devotion to her coffee cup, and was amused, yet a little startled, when he piled a monument of cake upon her plate and called on everyone to pass things down his way as Miss McCray was very hungry. It was a new sensation to find herself a part of the merriment. Heretofore, she had been only a spectator at such scenes. And thus, with a mind isolated from the vain world by such reflections, she started with Howard on their homeward ride.

It was a blustering, cloudy night. At first they chatted on about the commonplaces of Willow Creek. Flora McCray tried again and again to associate her recollection of the familiar face of her father's partner with the smooth-shaven face so near her in the night. Her repeated efforts were tantalizing. Little by little, did the wizard of the night weave her fancies, and then herself into the woof of his uncanny spell. Not only was she with a stranger, but she was herself a stranger to herself. It may have been the utter lonesomeness of the night that drew her close to him, but she came, and was not afraid.

Again he reached over her, and again tucked the wraps closer than ever about her, and the fumbling touches of his hands awakened the girl's new self to a delightful realization of the fact that a new being had come to her out of the darkness. She came even closer to this new-found presence, and almost cuddled against the man's great coat, and snuggled under his arm, that rested loosely upon the cushions behind her. Their talk, which had been growing more and more serious, gradually stopped.

"Are you cold—dear?" the young man asked, when he felt her come close to him. His words and his tone startled the girl and almost broke the spell. Flora McCray struggled a moment with the Girl in the Dark, and shuddered in despair as a voice from the Girl, who felt a strong arm quiet her, answered: "A little."



"She Came Even Closer to This New Found Presence, and Almost Cuddled Against the Man's Great Coat."

* * * * * * *

As the lights of the town came in sight the young couple grew silent. A turn in the road brought the buggy under the white glare of an electric light. Flora McCray was sitting upright with her hands folded under the robe, and Howard, with the whip and the lines in his hands, was consciously clucking at the horses. Each saw the other's face clearly, and as they crossed the circle of light the man spoke:

"It must be two o'clock."

The girl did not reply, and the young man leaned over to look out of the buggy, as if to scan the clouds. The prospect did not altogether satisfy him and he said:

"It's going to be a pretty gloomy Sunday, I guess."

As Howard put out his arms to help her from the buggy she barely touched his outstretched hand, and her decided shyness surprised him. In a bewilderment of confusion he said:

"You have made me very happy tonight, Miss McCray. Shall I speak to your father when I come out to dinner tomorrow?"

The girl did not reply, but went up the steps and into the house, while the young man climbed into the buggy, and beat time with the whip to the tune he was whistling, as he gave the horses the rein for the stable.

Flora McCray locked the door and slipped the bolt as quietly as she could. [illegible] put the hat down. She did not look at it again, but blew out the light and went to bed with her face turned from the guilty reminder. And all night long Flora McCray lashed herself for the folly of the Girl in the Dark. As she remembered it, she had made all the advances; he had only been kind and good to her.

The next morning, all of Willow Creek knew that John Howard had taken Flora McCray to Robinson's the night before, and that he was going to eat Sunday dinner with the McCrays that afternoon. But the town, as usual, was divided. One-half claimed that the McCrays had to have all of Howard's money, or they would fail; and the other half that John Howard was going to marry Flora McCray to keep the old man from prosecuting him for running off mortgaged cattle and reporting them as dead. And in the whole town no one could have been so thoroughly surprised as was Mr. McCray, when his daughter said to him, "Father, if Mr. Howard says anything to you about me, you will tell him—that—I cannot marry him."

McCray and his daughter were walking along the narrow, rough sidewalk toward the church, when these words were spoken. The mother had dropped back, and was not in hearing distance. McCray could not find voice for a few exclamatory "whys" and "whats" before his daughter had said firmly, "You will be sure, won't you, father?" and was waiting for her mother to catch up with them. After the service, the women, Flora and her mother among them, hurried home to attend to the feast of the day.

At the dinner table the young people met for the first time that day. Flora McCray felt keenly, and with a twinge of anguish, that the young man's cordial suavity in greeting her was only inspired by gratitude for her generosity in releasing him from any obligation.

She met his eye, and thought she read there a recollection of everything that had been. Then, as she looked down and away, all the sweetness and unreality of the night's ride was made real to her.

After dinner the men went into the parlor, where they smoked and talked alone, while the women put away the best china, afraid to trust it to the "hired girl." Finally, young Howard and Mr. McCray thought that the evening mail would be in and distributed. They put on their overcoats and were in the hall, when the elder man opened the dining-room door and said:

"Mother, John thinks it's time to go, and I am going to walk down to the post office with him."

When the front door closed Mrs. McCray said:

"What a nice young man John Howard is, isn't he?"

"Oh, yes, he is nice enough, I guess," answered the daughter, rising to go to her room.

As she neared the top of the stairs, Flora McCray quickened her pace. She ran through the upper hall. Once in her room, she went straight to the dresser, where the rumpled hat was still lying. The lonely girl stood before it a moment, and then, stooping awkwardly, touched the crumpled velvet with pursed, uncertain lips, as one ashamed. It may have been the dusk in the room, or it may have been the ghost of an odor from a cigar, that transported this unschooled heart back to the darkness, and the joy of a first caress. But dusk, or ghost, or something, came to this shy girl there, and nerved her whole being, so that she was no longer awkward, no longer uncertain, nor in any wise ashamed. The pretty velvet toy she made her shrine, and in her worship she kissed it, rubbed it with her burning cheek, and buried her face in its sacred folds.

ALLOW FOR FUTURE TRAFFIC

Surprising Facts Shown in Count Taken on Roads in Tennessee—Automobiles Doubled.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In building a road liberal allowance should be made for future increase in traffic, says the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture. A traffic count conducted by the bureau in co-operation with Tennessee officials on a number of roads in Davidson county, in which Nashville is located, shows surprising facts when compared with a similar count in 1916. During this period automobile registrations have doubled, while the number of motor vehicles on the road is five times as great as in 1916. In 1916 horse-drawn and motor-vehicle traffic were almost equal in volume. In 1921 horse-drawn traffic had decreased only slightly in volume and constituted 16 per cent of the traffic, motor vehicles constituting 84 per cent.

Oklahoma Hard-Surfaced Road Before and After Completion.

Observations in this and other counties lead to the conclusion that volume of traffic may increase in much greater proportion than the number of motor vehicles and will also depend to a large degree on the condition of improvement of the road and on the economic conditions in the adjacent territory.

BLAST-FURNACE SLAG TESTS

Use of Material for Road Construction to Be Given Test by Bureau of Roads.

Blast-furnace slag as a material for concrete road construction is to be thoroughly studied by the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture. With the enormous demand for road-building material, officials say, economy demands the use of material close at hand wherever possible, and the bureau is now conducting investigations of different materials with this in view.

Great quantities of slag are to be found at blast furnaces in various parts of the country. Samples from 32 plants have been collected and will be made into concrete and tested for resistance to wear, strength, water absorption and general utility. These results will be compared with similar tests made on other materials.

In addition to the laboratory tests it is possible that the experiments will be followed by an inspection of a number of concrete roads built with slag as the coarse material. These roads will be selected in various parts of the country and the reports, together with the laboratory tests, will furnish information which can be fully relied upon.

MANY WORKERS ON HIGHWAYS

According to Figures Given Out by Builders' Association, 114,325 Persons Are Engaged.

According to statistics given out by the American Road Builders' association there are 114,325 persons engaged in road building work. There are 80,000 federal, state, town and county highway officials, 7,000 road contractors, 2,000 bridge contractors, 15,000 civil and highway engineers, 10,000 automotive and chemical engineers and 325 geologists.

BETTER ROADS ON INCREASE

Total of 28,000 Miles Constructed Last Year, Half of Which Was With Federal Aid.

According to government figures, a total of 28,000 miles of good roads were built in the United States last year, or a distance equal to ten times the width of the country. Half of this mileage has been built by the state governments in conjunction with federal aid. The remaining 14,000 miles were constructed independent of federal assistance.

Two tired men—the sort of men who are always tired—were talking about the forthcoming election in their town, and discussing the rival candidates.

"Now, that Mr. Pusher is a good sort!" said one.

"I'm not so sure of that," replied the other. "But what makes you think that?"

"Why, did you notice how heartily he shook hands with me?"

"Yes, I did," replied his friend.

"He wasn't content with one hand, he grabbed both. He's a good fellow, he is."

The other looked at him thoughtfully for a moment. Then he said: "Yes, and he's very proud of his gold watch!"

GATHER IN WHEAT

Farmers of Western Canada Rejoice at Harvest.

Largest Crop in the History of the Fertile Provinces May Be Considered Assured.

Reports of Western Canada's wheat crop, which may be considered fairly accurate, as they are made at the end of the season, when the crop is fully harvested, would indicate a yield of between 350,000,000 and 370,000,000 bushels from a total acreage of 21,471,000. This is the greatest yield in the history of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. This immense yield has only been harvested through the combined energies of all public bodies—railways and governments. It required the assistance, outside of that locally employed, of upward of 40,000 men. These were brought into the country from the East, the West and the South, by trainloads, and rushed forward at express speed, to be placed in the different districts, under the direction of officials who were kept advised daily, by wire, of the needs.

As a result of this combined effort the largest wheat crop in the history of the West was successfully harvested. The threshing reports show that almost universally, in every section of the country, the grain graded high. In very few places did rain interfere with stacking. The province of Manitoba was the first to complete threshing, very few fields being left at the time of writing.

Portions of Saskatchewan that had suffered from drought for the past two or three years reaped a crop that largely made up for past disappointments.

In Alberta there was a strange condition. In the central district, always noted for its heavy yields, there was considerable of a falling off. Instead of the 35 and 40 bushel yields the average ran from 10 to 12, while in southern portions, where drought had affected the country for some time past, there were exceptionally high yields.

Reports of individual yields in different portions of the three provinces lead to the impression that when threshing returns are in there will be found to have been a much better crop than at present seems possible. Some of these returns give individual farmers as getting as high as 45 bushels others 35, and so on, while in some districts, where in early August not more than 8 or 10 bushels might be looked for, 15 and 18 bushels are recorded, the improvement having been brought about by rains that worked marvels in the appearance of the crop. And then, too, instead of the head carrying four rows, most of them carried six rows, and filled to the top, which, to those who know, means at least fifty per cent more.

The rye crop of all Western Canada is exceptionally good; the oats generally good and barley fair.

The weather at the time of writing is threatening for a rainy spell, which may interfere with threshing, and prolong it somewhat.

Most of the newcomers from the States have excellent crops. During August, the trains to Western Canada carried hundreds of capitalists and others interested in Western Canada land, going up to take care of the crop that they had arranged to have put in on the land they owned. Very few of them will be disappointed.—Advertisement.

Obituary

Emma Shirts, daughter of Elizabeth and George Shirts, was born near Lisbon, Columbia County, O., September 4, 1845. She departed this life at Warsaw, Indiana, October 4, 1922, age 77 years and one month.

When but a babe of 16 month her parents came to Indiana, returning to Ashland Ohio when she was 4. A few years later they moved to Plymouth, Ohio where her father died, leaving her mother with seven children, all of whom have since passed away to the Great Beyond, save one sister of the deceased, Mrs. Harriett Culbertson of Auburn, Indiana. After her father's death the family made their home with Grandfather Miller, near Spencerville.

At the age of 12 she was converted and united with the Christian church at Coburntown. She remained a true and devoted Christian throughout her entire life.

When 19 years old she was united in marriage to Byron A. Woodcox, a veteran of the Civil War. To this union were born 5 children, Claudia, who died in infancy; Aubrey, who passed away at the tender age of 10; and 3 who yet survive their mother; namely, Audrey Eichholtz, twin sister of Aubrey, living at Warsaw, Indiana, Cornelius A. Woodcox, residing at Convoy, Ohio, and Cadmir Lynn Woodcox of Garrett, Indiana.

The greater portion of her life was spent near Coburntown. Here her husband died in September, 1898. Shortly afterwards she moved to St. Joe, living here until October 18, 1919, when poor health and old age forced her to break up her home. She spent the remaining days of her life in the homes of her children and grandson, Gray, save a few months that at her own request she stayed at the Old Peoples' Home at Avilla.

In her old age, when too feeble to attend services at the Christian church she faithfully worshipped at the Lutheran Sunday School, where, according to her own personal testimony, she received great strength and comfort from the teachings and Bible lessons.

In addition to raising and caring for her own family, she unselfishly devoted many years of her precious life to raising her grandson, Gray Woodcox whose mother died when he was but three months old.

She leaves to mourn her departure the three children, one sister, seven grandchildren and a host of other relatives and friends.

Out-of-town people who attended the funeral held at the Christian Church, Friday afternoon were Mr. and Mrs. [illegible]

SIT IN JUDGMENT ON 2-CENT PIECE

British Law Lords Give Grave Consideration to Appeal of Scotsman.

WINS A FAVORABLE DECISION

May Sue Traction Company, Whose Conductor Refused to Accept Battered Coin Offered in Payment of Fare.

London.—The five law lords, constituting the house of lords, in session as the supreme court of appeals, sat around in solemn semicircle. Lord Haldane sat in the place of lord chancellor upon the woolsack, with the throne itself behind him. Lord Finlay and Lord Cave sat upon his right, Lord Dunedin and Lord Wrenbury upon his left. In the magnificent chamber, its red benches nearly empty except for a group of lawyers and officials near the entrance, the five law lords, in grave tones befitting their high function, read out their learned judgments one by one. Notable documents these, in which the five concurred in one decision, abounding in such portentous words as torts, malfeasances, condescendences and the like.

Clearly a landmark this, in the history of the development of the law of England. What grave matter was thus engaging the earnest consideration of the noble and learned lords? Surely nothing less than the fate of some great township, or the destiny of some estate of millions?

My noble and learned lords, in point of fact, were talking about a penny—a two-cent piece. It sounds better translated into American currency. My Lord Finlay seems to think something the same himself, for throughout his judgment he referred to it not as a "penny," but as a "penny piece," or "a coin." Need it be said whose penny it was; that had been carried up all the various steps of the law into the house of lords? It was a Scotsman's penny.

Conductor Refuses Penny.

Almost two years ago one John Percy climbed upon a street car in the city of Glasgow. He tendered to the conductor of the car in payment of his fare a penny which was slightly marked and indented. It was, in fact, a penny which John Percy had himself received earlier in the day from another conductor, and he determined to return it in the way by which it had come to him. The conductor, however, did not like the looks of the penny, and demanded another in its place. John Percy said it was good enough and refused to give another. An inspector was called to reinforce the conductor, and still John Percy refused.

Finally he was marched off to the police station on a charge of refusing to pay his fare. He was kept there only ten minutes, but this was long enough to fire him with determination to see justice done between himself and the Glasgow corporation, which owns the street cars.

John Percy then commenced an action against the corporation for $25,000 damages on the ground that the actions of the conductor and inspector had been injurious to his feelings and his reputation. He lost the first round of his fight in Scotland when the court of session dismissed his claim, on the ground that the corporation was not responsible for these actions of its employees.

One "Bonnie" Fighter.

But John Percy is evidently what they call in Scotland a "bonnie fighter," and he carried his case up to the house of lords. He did not pay his railroad fare to London for the purpose, nor is he being put to any expense in the costly process of suing before the highest court of appeal. He has taken advantage of the legal provision which permits a poor person to set the law in motion at the state's charge if he sues in forma pauperis. And now the house of lords has decided in his favor.

Whether John Percy's penny really was good or no better than it should be is still not decided. What the law lords have ruled is that the corporation can be sued upon a mistake made by the conductor and inspector. That is enough for John Percy. EFFECT OF LIGHT ON EYES

Simple Reason Why Luminous Watch Dial Is Not Visible in Dark Tunnel by Day.

Why should a watch dial be luminous at night and not luminous in a dark tunnel by day? The trouble is not with the dial but with your eyes. In sunlight the pupils of our eyes contract and shut out part of the brightness; in darkness they expand and let in all the light they can. But our pupils do not contract or expand instantly; they take fifteen minutes or more even to go from their smallest to their largest size. At night most of us are in artificial light, which is seldom so strong as daylight, and consequently our pupils expand a good deal. When we put out the light our pupils do not have to expand far to enable us to see well in the dark.

Dials are luminous only when the hands and the numbers are coated with luminous paint, which is made by mixing radium with zinc sulphide in the ratio of one to a million. The amount of radium on any one dial cannot be measured except by the incredibly refined methods of a modern science. A year or two ago a well-known member of congress asked the chief of the bureau of standards in Washington whether he thought he could take the "little end of nothing whittled down to a fine point and use it to poke the pith out of a mouse's whisker."

"Oh," replied the scientist, with a smile, "that would be coarse work, very coarse, indeed."

DESERTED WIRES FOR ALTAR

Japanese Feminine Telephone Operators, Superstitiously Inclined, Interfered With Business.

The extent to which tradition and superstition often interfere with Japanese business is indicated by the sudden increase in marriages among telephone operators this year. One of the oldest customs in Japan is to assign the name of a bird or an animal to each year. The year 1920 was "monkey year," which in Japanese is pronounced "saru." Now, as this also means "to go away," the apprehension has arisen that girls married in that year are very apt to be deserted by their husbands. The following year, however, is that of the birds, for which the Japanese word "tari" means "to take." Hence a marked increase has been noted in the number of girls who have taken the matrimonial plunge.

As might be expected, the result has not tended to improve the Japanese telephone service, which is operated exclusively by the government. There are about 200,000 applications for service now waiting to be filled, and there is about one-half a telephone for each 100 inhabitants, as against 18 telephones for each 100 inhabitants in the United States.

Telegraphy by Taste.

Two radio engineers, Alfred N. Goldsmith and Edward T. Dickey, have recently conducted a series of experiments with the object of determining the feasibility of reception of radio signals by the sense of taste. Electrodes were made which could be placed under the tongue in such a way as to cause a taste sensation when a source of potential was connected to them. Tests were made, using low potential direct current, to ascertain the amount of energy and potential power necessary for taste reception. The reception of actual signals from an antenna was tried. It was found impossible by using four stages of amplification to obtain taste sensations from all the signals the audibilty of which was greater than 500 in the detector circuit. The results obtained thus indicate that while from an electrical standpoint it is possible to receive raido signals by tho sense of taste, the sense of taste is much inferior to that of hearing or even of sight, as a method of reception.

Why Lead Disintegrates.

Professor Matignon, of the College of France, has described experiments made by him with ancient medals, vases and so forth, of lead, which are gradually disintegrating in the Museum of Cluny. After a certain number of years they fall into dust. The cause, it is thought, lies in the presence of minute traces of saline matter, with which the objects have become impregnated during their long burial in the soil or under water. These microscopic chemical impurities play the part of bacteria and microbes in living bodies. In other words, the lead is "sick," and unless the noxious matter be removed, will inevitably perish. Curiously enough, it is [illegible] of salt are [illegible] to a fresh mass of lead, it is [illegible] eventually falls to pieces like the objects in the museum.

MOLE IS MARVEL OF ENERGY AND POSSESSES INSATIABLE APPETITE

Tests Show Mole Is Carnivorous Animal.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Perhaps no other animal is relatively so strong, does so much hard work in a day, or eats so much in proportion to its size and weight, as the American mole. A mole's appetite seems to be almost insatiable. When held in captivity and given food to its liking, it will sometimes eat more than its own weight in a day. This need for a large quantity of food is probably due to the intense activity of the little animal, for experiments have shown that it may be found at work at any hour of the day or night, whenever its runways require repairing or it is in need of new sources of food supplies.

From the standpoint of food habits, it would seem that moles are chiefly beneficial or at least neutral. Experiments conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture show that the mole is a carnivorous animal, though vegetable matter is occasionally found in its stomach. An examination of the stomachs of 200 moles showed that earthworms and white grubs form the bulk of the food. Beetles and their larvae and other insects that enter the ground, spiders, centipedes, and cocoons also form a portion. In one stomach were found the remains of 71 small white grubs, in one 250 ant puparia, in one ten cutworms, and in another 12 earthworms. In captivity, moles ravenously eat beefsteak, flesh of birds, fish, or almost any sort of fresh meat, but starve to death when supplied with nothing other than grain and root crops.

The chief damage done by the mole seems to be in tearing up gardens and making unsightly ridges in lawns. Moles have been dealt with in the United States chiefly as a nuisance, but in some European countries they are trapped extensively not only to be rid of them as a pest but also to harvest their pelts. In this country it has been demonstrated that moles are never dormant, that they never hibernate. They may be trapped at any time of the year when the ground is not frozen too hard to permit the working of the trap.

DIFFERENT NAMES IN WHEAT BY-PRODUCTS

Much Confusion Caused by Use of Various Terms.

Shorts and Middlings Are Used Synonymously in Some Sections of Country—Table Shows Styles Used in Many States.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Sectional differences in the use of names for by-products of wheat are often confusing, says the United States Department of Agriculture in calling attention to the terms used in the regions growing the three principal types of wheat. The near Northwest, which includes Minnesota, the Dakotas, and parts of adjoining states, grows hard spring wheat; the Southwest, also Nebraska and Kansas, grows hard winter wheat; and the East and states as far west as Missouri and Iowa grow soft winter wheat. Of course, these areas overlap to some extent.

Most of the confusion has been caused by different names for shorts and middlings. In some parts of the country these terms are used synonymously, in others one may be used to the exclusion of the other. Where both are used there seems to be a tendency to apply the term "shorts" to the coarser materials, such as standard middlings; and the term "middlings" to the finer materials, such as red dog flour.

While there often may be considerable differences in the composition of corresponding by-products because of the differences in composition and texture of the wheat and of the slight differences in milling practice, the methods of manufacture in the different milling sections are similar and the following table, read horizontally, shows the names used in the different regions for the same by-product feed:

Northwest.	Southwest.	East.
Bran.	Bran.	Bran.
Standard middlings.	Brown shorts.	Brown middlings.
Flour middlings.	Gray shorts.	Gray middlings.
Red Dog.	White shorts.	White middlings.
Wheat mixed feed.	Wheat mixed feed.	Wheat mixed feed.

"Shipstuff" is a term that has been used in the past for various wheat by-products. It has no very definite meaning, although it seems to apply only to wheat products.

Sows put on balanced rations raised 71 per cent more pigs than those receiving the same management but fed on low protein rations in a "Save the Pig" campaign carried on by extension workers in Kansas last spring. Farrowing records were kept by 58 farmers. According to a report received by the United States Department of Agriculture, 263 sows on 29 farms received corn and a protein supplement of either tankage, skim milk, alfalfa, or linseed-oil meal. These 263 sows farrowed 2,669 pigs, an average of 10 to a litter; of these pigs, 1,713 were weaned, an average of 6.5 pigs per litter. On 11 farms, 166 sows received mostly corn rations, farrowing 1,194 pigs, an average of 7 to the litter; of these pigs, 1,645 were weaned, an average of 3.8 pigs to a litter.

CONTROL CURCULIO BY SPRAY

Good Progress Made in Georgia in Overcoming Infestation—Big Peach Crop Produced.

One of the best peach crops ever produced in Georgia has just been harvested, it is reported to the United States Department of Agriculture. Very good progress was made in overcoming the heavy curculio infestation. All varieties, through to the close of the Elberta season, have been unusually free from curculio larvae.

Careful investigations of commercial orchards treated according to the advice of department and state specialists showed that curculio damage was not greater than an average of one wormy peach in each five-eighths bushel basket. In these orchards dropped fruit was picked up and destroyed, and cultivation for the destruction of pupae practiced, in addition to very thorough spraying.

TO DRIVE OUT TUBERCULOSIS

Plan for Eradicating Disease in Cattle From Entire Areas Daily Growing in Popularity.

The plan for eradicating tuberculosis in cattle from entire areas, such as counties, is daily growing in popularity according to reports coming to the United States Department of Agriculture. The idea has taken hold in Michigan and is spreading rapidly. Already five counties have been freed of the plague, and reports from the inspector in charge for the government show that the boards of supervisors have appropriated money and made provisions for cooperating with state and federal forces. When one county joins the ranks for eradication its action stimulates others to follow. [illegible]

"Books be d—d!" snorted the chief, and leaned forward earnestly. "Look here, Fell! Do you believe in your heart that Maillard killed his father?"

Fell was silent a moment under that intent scrutiny.

"From the evidence, I am forced against my will to believe it," he said at last. "Of course, he'll be able to prove that he was not the Masquer on previous occasions; his alibis will take care of that. Up to the point of the murder, his story is all right. And, my friend, there is a chance—a very slim, tenuous chance—that his entire story is true. In that case, another person must have appeared as the Masquer, which seems unlikely—"

"Or else," put in Ben Chacherre, smoothly, "the real original Masquer showed up!"

There was an instant silence. Jachin Fell regarded his henchman with steady gray eyes. Ben Chacherre met the look with almost a trace of defiance. The chief frowned darkly.

"Yes," said the chief. "That's the size of it, Fell. You're keepin' quiet about the name of the real Masquer; why?"

"Because," said Fell, calmly, "I happen to know that he was in the auditorium at the time of the murder."

Again silence. Ben Chacherre stared at Fell, with amazement and admiration in his gaze. "When the master lies, he lies magnificently!" he murmured in French.

"Well," and the chief gestured despairingly, "I guess that lets out the real Masquer, eh?"

"Exactly," assented Fell. "No use dragging his name into it. I'll keep at work on this, chief, and if anything turns up to clear young Maillard, I'll be very glad."

"All right," grunted the chief, and rose. "I'll be on my way."

He departed. Neither Fell nor Chacherre moved or spoke for a space. When at length the clang of the elevator door resounded through the deserted corridors Ben Chacherre slipped from his chair and went to the outer door. He glanced out into the hall, closed the door, and with a nod returned to his chair.

"Well?" Jachin Fell regarded him with intent, searching eyes. "Have you any light to throw on the occasion?"

Chacherre's usual air of cool impudence was never in evidence when he talked with Mr. Fell.

"No," he said, shaking his head. "Hammond worked on the car until about nine o'clock, then beat it to bed, I guess. I quit the job at ten, and his light had been out some time. Well, master, this is a queer affair! There's no doubt that Gramont pulled it, eh?"

"You think so?" asked Fell.

Chacherre made a gesture of assent. "When the tree falls, the kid can climb it! Any fool can see that Gramont was the man. Don't you think so yourself, master?"

Jachin Fell nodded.

"Yes. But we've no evidence—everything lies against young Maillard. Early in the morning Gramont goes to Paradis to examine that land of Miss Ledanois' along the bayou. [illegible] probably say nothing of this murder to Hammond, and the chauffeur may [illegible] rage people? They bought it innocently." A peculiar smile twisted Fell's lips awry. "In fact, they bought it from a man named Hammond, as the evidence will show very clearly."

Ben Chacherre started, since he had sold that car himself. Then a slow grin came into his thin features—a grin that widened into a noiseless laugh.

"Master, you are magnificent!" he said, and rose. "Well, if there is nothing further on hand, I shall go to bed."

"An excellent program," said Jachin Fell, and took his hat from the desk. "I must get some sleep myself."

They left the office and the building together.

Three hours afterward the dawn had set in—a cold, gray and dismal dawn that rose upon a city littered with the aftermath of carnival. "Lean Wednesday" it was, in sober fact. Thus far, the city in general was ignorant of the tragedy which had taken place at the very conclusion of its gayest carnival season. Within a few hours business and social circles would be swept by the fact of Joseph Maillard's murder, but at this early point of the day the city slept. The morning papers, which today carried a news story that promised to shock and stun the entire community, were not yet distributed.

Rising before daylight, Henry Gramont and Hammond breakfasted early and were off by six in the car. They were well outside town and sweeping on their way to Terrebonne parish and the town of Paradis before they realized that the day was not going to brighten appreciably. Instead, it remained very cloudy and gloomy, with a chill threat of rain in the air.

Weather mattered little to Gramont. When finally the excellent highway was left behind, and they started on the last lap of their seventy-mile ride, they found the parish roads execrable and the going slow. Thus, noon was at hand when they at length pulled into Paradis, the town closest to Lucie Ledanois' bayou land. The rain was still holding off.

"Too cold to rain," observed Gramont. "Let's hit for the hotel and get something to eat. I'll have to locate the land, which is somewhere near town."

They discovered the hotel to be an ancient structure, and boasting prices worthy of Lafitte and his buccaneers. As in many small towns of Louisiana, however, the food proved fit for a king. After a light luncheon of quail, crayfish bisque, and probably illegal venison, Gramont sighed regret that he could eat no more, and set about inquiring where the Ledanois farm lay.

There was very little, indeed, to Paradis, which lay on the bayou but well away from the railroad. It was a desolate spot, unpainted and unkempt. The parish seat of Houma had robbed it of all life and growth on the one hand; on the other, the new oil and gas district had not yet touched it.

Southward lay the swamp—fully forty miles of it, merging by degrees into the Gulf. Forty miles of cypress marsh and winding bayou, uncharted, unexplored save by occasional hunters or semi-occasional sheriffs. No man knew who or what might be in those swamps, and no one cared to know. The man who brought in fish or oysters in his skiff might be a bayou fisherman, and he might be a murderer wanted in ten states. Curiosity was apt to prove extremely unhealthy. Like the Atchafalaya, where chance travelers find themselves abruptly ordered elsewhere, the Terrebonne swamps have their own secrets and know how to keep them.

Gramont had no difficulty in locating the Ledanois land, and he found that it was by no means in the swamp. A part of it, lying closer to Houma, had been sold and was now included in the new oil district; it was this portion which Joseph Maillard had sold off.

The remainder, and the largest portion, lay north of Paradis and ran along the west bank of the bayou for half a mile. A long-abandoned farm, it was high ground, with the timber well cleared off and excellently located; but tenants were hard to get and shiftless when obtained, so that the place had not been farmed for the last five years or more. After getting these facts, Gramont consulted with Hammond.

"We'd better buy some grub here in town and arrange to stay a couple of nights on the farm, if necessary," he said. "There are some buildings there [illegible] the bayou [illegible] road [illegible] three or four miles [illegible]"

With some provisions [illegible] in the car, they set forth. The road wound along the bayou side, past [illegible]

a cluster of towering trees. Indeed, trees were everywhere about the farm, which had grown up in a regular sapling forest. The buildings were in a ruinous state—clapboards hanging loosely, roofs dotted by gaping holes, doors and windows long since gone.

Leaving the car, Gramont, followed by the chauffeur, went to the front doorway and surveyed the wreckage inside.

"What do you say, Hammond? Think we can stop here, or go back to the hotel? It's not much of a run to town—"

Hammond pointed to a wide fireplace facing them.

"I can get this shack cleaned out in about half an hour—this one room, anyhow. When we get a fire goin' in there, and board up the windows and doors, we ought to be comfortable enough. But suit yourself, cap'n! It's your funeral."

Gramont laughed. "All right. Go ahead and clean up, then, and if rain comes down we can camp here. Be sure and look for snakes and vermin. The floor seems sound, and if there's plenty of moss on the trees, we can make up comfortable beds. Too bad you're not a fisherman, or we might get a fresh fish out of the bayou—"

"Think We Can Stop Here, or Go Back to the Hotel?"

"I got some tackle in town," and Hammond grinned widely.

"Good work! Then make yourself at home and go to it. We've most of the afternoon before us."

Gramont left the house, and headed down toward the bayou shore.

He took a letter from his pocket, opened it, and glanced over it anew. It was an old letter, one written him nearly two years previously by Lucie Ledanois. It had been written merely in the endeavor to distract the thoughts of a wounded soldier, to bring his mind to Louisiana, away from the stricken fields of France. In the letter Lucie had described some of the more interesting features of Bayou Terrebonne—the oyster and shrimp fleets, the Chinese and Filipino villages along the gulf, the far-spread cypress swamps; the bubbling fountains, natural curiosities, that broke up through the streams and bayous of the whole wide parish—fountains that were caused by gas seeping up from the earth's interior, and breaking through.

Gramont knew that plans were already afoot to tap this field of natural gas and pipe it to New Orleans. Oil had been found, too, and all the state was now oil-mad. Fortunes were being made daily, and other fortunes were being lost daily by those who dealt with oil stocks instead of with oil.

"Those gas fountains did the work!" reflected Gramont. "And according to this letter there's one of those fountains here in the bayou, close to her property. 'Just opposite the dock,' she says. The first thing is to find the dock, then the fountain. After that, we'll decide if it's true mineral gas. If it is, then the work's done—for I'll sure take a chance on finding oil near it!"

Gramont came to the bayou and began searching his way along the thick and high fringe of bushes and saplings that girded the water's edge. Presently he came upon the ruined evidences of what had once been a small boat shed. Not far from this he found the dock referred to in the letter; nothing was left of it except a few spiles protruding from the surface of the water. [illegible] to look farther. [illegible], he saw that [illegible]

Remarkable Recovery Case in Serious Kidney Case.

This letter, from George Roberts of Church street, Malpas, Cheshire, England, sounds almost unbelievable, yet every word is true and was signed before a notary public.

For eleven years I suffered acute pain and sickness. I consulted several prominent doctors and each one had a different opinion. At last I was put under X-rays and it was found I was suffering from gall stones. My doctors and the specialist at the Royal Infirmary, Chester, told me they were not porous and no medicine in the world would move them, so there remained nothing for it but an operation. When my wife heard this she told me to get Dodd's Kidney Pills, as they had cured her when she suffered from black jaundice and gall stones. It is now nineteen years since my wife felt any symtoms of these troubles. I purchased a quantity of Dodd's Kidney Pills and took them according to directions. This is seven years ago and I have had no return of the trouble.

It was a surprise for all the doctors. They had to admit the fact as I was under the X-rays several times, and for a while they did not know what to make of it, until they found they had disappeared altogether. They asked me what I had been taking and were not pleased when I told them Dodd's Kidney Pills. I am enjoying the best of health and have lost no time through sickness. I also suffered with rheumatism as well as gall stones before I was cured by taking Dodd's Kidney Pills.

A FRIEND IN NEED A FRIEND INDEED

Writes Mrs. Hardee Regarding Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Los Angeles, Calif.—"I must tell you that I am a true friend to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I have taken it off and on for twenty years and it has helped me change from a delicate girl to a stout, healthy woman. When I was married I was sick all the time until I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I was in bed much of my time with pains and had to have the doctor every month. One day I found a little book in my yard in Guthrie, Oklahoma, and I read it through and got the medicine—Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound—and took eight bottles and used the Sanative Wash. I at once began to get stronger. I have got many women to take it just by telling them what it has done for me. I have a young sister whom it has helped in the same way it helped me. I want you to know that I am a 'friend indeed,' for you were a 'friend in need.'"—Mrs. GEORGE HARDEE, 1048 Byram St., Los Angeles, California

INDIANA BREVITIES

Gary.—Dan Melloy and Herman Nyhof, Gary constables, sentenced by Judge A. B. Anderson of the Federal court at Indianapolis, December 6, 1921, for one year and a day in the Leavenworth federal prison on the charge of conspiracy to violate the prohibition laws and for transporting liquor from one state to another, will be set free October 16, J. Glenn Harris, state representative, who represented the men, said. They receive a rebate of five days a month for good behavior. Whether they will testify before the special federal grand jury convening in November is problematical. They will return to Gary.

Indianapolis. — Indianapolis will have 100 citizen policemen on duty, their names being kept secret, and their duty being to report to the chiefs of the police and fire departments such things as violations of the automobile speed laws and the maintenance of fire hazards, it was decided by the board of public safety after a subcommittee of the chamber of commerce fire prevention committee had asked that such a citizens' force be appointed.

Anderson.—George Keplinger, twenty-one years old, was fatally injured and C. J. Weschler, thirty-five years old, had his right shoulder wrenched and was internally hurt when an automobile bus in which they were riding sideswiped a city car here. Keplinger's bride of a few months saw the accident. Mrs. Keplinger was riding in the rear seat of the automobile and her husband was riding on the running board of the machine.

Bloomington.—The Rotary club has pledged a subscription of $3,000 to the James Whitcomb Riley Memorial Hospital for Children of Indianapolis. The club made the pledge after President William Lowe Bryan appeared at the regular luncheon and explained the purposes and benefits of the proposed hospital. The Bloomington Kiwanis club also voted to make a substantial subscription to the hospital, the amount to be decided upon later.

Brazil.—Bishop Frederick Leete of Indianapolis drew applause from the ministers and laymen attending the Northwestern Indiana Conference of the Methodist church, when he declared that Great Britain is taking the right stand in opposing the Turks and opposing the occupation of open territory in the Dardanelles, and that the United States should be the first country to support Great Britain in this move.

Huntington.—An enrollment increase of 350 per cent in the last three years is the remarkable record made by Huntington college, located at Ubee. The college is maintained by the United Brethren church, although the school is nonsectarian. Last year the enrollment was 100 per cent over that of the year before, and this year is 50 per cent over the record made last year.

Terre Haute.—Burglars entered the soft drink place of Jerry Meninstrina, in West Terre Haute, and carried away an iron safe said to have contained about $700 in cash. Indications about the place were that the robbers backed a truck up to the building, unlocked the back door, rolled the safe out and hauled it away.

Indianapolis.—One hundred and twenty-six new school buildings, costing approximately $7,000,000, have been constructed in Indiana this year, according to reports received by the state department of public instruction. This building program, which has been carried out in more than two-thirds of the counties of the state, is an index of educational progress.

Indianapolis.—A complete hydrographic map of the state of Indiana has been published by the division of geology of the state conservation department. This map shows in detail the drainage lines of the state, the boundaries of the counties, the locations of lakes and their approximate size as to acreage.

Greenburg. — The Burney State bank at Burney was closed by Charles Dowden, state bank examiner, following a report made to the state board by directors of the institution, which stated that its condition was unsafe due to heavy withdrawals by depositors. It will remain closed pending an examination.

English.—In order to check what threatened to become a diphtheria epidemic, all public meetings in English, graded and high school sessions and church services have been discontinued. Eighteen cases of diphtheria have been reported in the last three months and although there was one death from the disease in July, most of the cases have been mild. The school authorities and Dr. Fred R. Gobbel, county health commissioner, have deemed it advisable to observe a strict quarantine for several days.

Jeffersonville.—Judge Marion Griffith of Vevay, selected to try the Jeffersonville annexation cases, in which remonstrance is made against annexation of property adjoining the city, reassigned the cases for November 22. That will be within a few days of four years since the council adopted the annexation ordinance, doubling the city's area and adding 50 per cent to the population. The matter has been in the courts ever since.

Pershing.—One hundred years of congregational history was reviewed by the Lutheran church of Pershing. In a centennial celebration, chief interest centering in the address of Rev. M. L. E. Wagner of Dayton, O., the only member of the congregation trained for the ministry in its entire history. The Lutheran church in Pershing was the only one in eastern Indiana until 1841 when a second one was established at Richmond.

Bloomington.—Judge Herbert Rundell in Circuit court made his ruling in the state cases against Night Police Captains Orville Thomas and Night Patrolman Willard Farr and Claude Harris, charged with breaking into a local packing house several weeks ago. The court sustained the first and third counts of the grand jury indictments. The second count of the indictment was quashed because no allegation was made.

Evansville.—Authorization for a campaign for $1,000,000 has been given Evansville college, unanimously, by the two great organizations which will cooperate in raising the money—the Indiana conference of the Methodist church and the Evansville chamber of commerce. The money will be raised by June 1, 1923, and will be used for current expenses, endowment and dormitories. A goal of $2,500,000 in the next five years is set by the college.

Gary.—Suits filed by Robert G. Thompson of Gary and Stogan Stoac of Indiana Harbor, attacking the constitutionality of the law reducing the number of justices of the peace in Calumet and North township from four to one, which were set for hearing before Judge V. S. Reiter of Hammond, have been sent to the circuit court at Valparaiso on petitions of the attorneys in the cases.

Madison.—Lucy Gray, thirteen-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Gray of this city, who disappeared from her home, was found near Vevay, 20 miles from here. The child was walking along a road when found and said she was on the way to eastern Kentucky to visit relatives.

Special Care of Baby.

That Baby should have a bed of its own all are agreed. Yet it is more reasonable for an infant to sleep with grown-ups than to use a man's medicine in an attempt to regulate the delicate organism of that same infant. Either practice is to be shunned. Neither would be tolerated by specialists in children's diseases.

Your Physician will tell you that Baby's medicine must be prepared with even greater care than Baby's food.

A Baby's stomach when in good health is too often disarranged by improper food. Could you for a moment, then, think of giving to your ailing child anything but a medicine especially prepared for Infants and Children? Don't be deceived.

Make a mental note of this:—It is important, Mothers, that you should remember that to function well, the digestive organs of your Baby must receive special care. No Baby is so abnormal that the desired results may be had from the use of medicines primarily prepared for grown-ups.

Original Chinese in Siam.

J. F. Rock, adventurous plant hunter, reports from Kengtung, Burma, to the Agricultural department that he has found a village of the original Chinese referred to in the oldest historical book of China, which dates back 2,000 years before Christ. "They are called Miao," he says, "and do not eat or grow any rice, but only corn. They cut down the forests and plant corn at an elevation of 3,500 to 4,000 feet on the elephant-shaped mountain of Doi Chang on which they live. They are the dirtiest people I ever saw, barring not even the Tibetans. Their naked children wallow in the mire with the pigs. Disappointed.

"I thought my cousin from Kay See was a pretty smart feller when he visited me here last summer," disgruntedly said Burt Blurt of Petunia, "but when I was up to the city this week I found out he hain't got no sense at all. After I'd been there a spell he said he'd take me out and show me the beauties of Kansas City. I got a shave and a shine, and so on, and then what d'ye think? Some Interesting Facts

Isaac Meese, one of our Civil war veterans left in our midst, told some very interesting facts of his life to the editor Wednesday.

Just sixty years ago last Sunday on October 8, 1862, he fought in his first battle at Perryville, Kentucky. He was mustered into service just one month and nine days before that date at Louisville, Kentucky, at the age of eighteen years. He spent three years in service, and fought in twenty-two battles. He was wounded twice but was never in a hospital for treatment.

He marched the distance of 2200 miles, from Louisville to Washington D. C., without a single ride.

Mr. Meese is now a man of nearly 79 years of age and and can boast of the fact that he has never been down sick in his life. Even now he is as spry and as well as the average man at 60 years.

We would be glad to hear from more of our old veterans. They all have some interesting facts worth listening to, or reading.

"Covering the Subject"

Old Si Chestnut says: "An advertisement should be like a woman's dress—long enough to cover the subject, but short enough to be interesting."

All right. Here goes. Our subject: A check on our bank is better than a U. S. Treasury Note. Why? Because, if you loose your Treasury Note by fire, theft, hold-up or accident, it is gone for good, that's all. But if the same accident should happen to a check on our bank, you can stop payment and have a new check issued. Is that short enough to be interesting?

Rebekah District Meeting

The Rebekah district meeting was held at this place Thursday, October 12th in the I. O. O. F. Hall.

The morning session was called to order at 9:30 by the President, Mrs. Robison of Butler, followed by the welcome address by Anna Rickett, which was responded to by District Vice President, Mrs. Moccasin of Waterloo.

This was a business session. The Secy's report of meeting at Hudson in July was read. The roll was then called and the following responded with the number of members present: Auburn, 35; Butler, 13; Garrett, 7; Waterloo, 7; Angola, 6; Hudson, 5; Ashley, 5. There were none present from Fremont, Salem Center, Mets or Hamilton.

Sister Valetta Kimmel of Kendallville, Vice President of the state and also President of the home board at the I. O. O. F. home at Greensburg, conducted the school of instruction and gave a very interesting talk on the home and its work. Every one enjoyed hearing her and anyone connected with the Rebekah work cannot but help being benefited by hearing her or coming in contact with her as she is also a consecrated Christian.

Mrs. Jesse Baxter of Waterloo, D. D. President, was also present.

At the noon hour the local Rebekahs served dinner to over 100 in the Lutheran church basement.

The afternoon session opened at one o'clock with the St. Joe officers in charge. The meeting was then turned over to the Auburn degree staff and at this time Rev. R. B. Daily and Miss Katherine Curie were initiated. The work was very impressive and beatuifully done by the Auburn Sisters as expressed in the hearty applause when they finished.

After the degree work was completed; the silver loving cup was presented to the Auburn Lodge by Mrs. Valletta Kimmel, with a very impressive ceremony.

Sister Robison greatly surprised the local lodge when she presented them with a silver offering from the District, amounting to $8.64. The proceeds from the dinner were $35.55. The attendance for the day was estimated at 150.

That it was one of the most successful meetings held for some time was the opinion of all present and all felt it a day well spent.

Among Folks You Know

The News has just arranged for a series of articles by William Allen White, which depict true pictures of life where it is lived closest to the heart—not in the metropolitan centers, but in the smaller communities, where, however, existence furnishes such varied form of experience that no man could tell them all.

Mr. White, Kansas newspaper man and eminent author, is writing some of the best distinctively American "stuff" that is appearing in this country today, and this present series is considered by critics worth to be ranked with his best efforts.

The first story is contained in this issue of The News, and another will appear each week for some time to come. Some of the incidents described by Mr. White probably will remind readers of The News of similar situations in their lives—perhaps even right in this community.

If you start reading this series, we are sure you will take pains to read every one of them.

A Story of the Highlands

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

CROSSING the Missouri river into Kansas, the west-bound traveler begins a steady, upward climb, until he reaches the summit of the Rockies. The journey through Kansas covers in four hundred miles nearly five thousand feet of the long, upward slant. In that long hillside there are three or four distinct kinds of landscape, distinguished from one another by the trees that trim the bottom.

The hills and bluffs that roll away from the river are covered with scrub oaks, elms, walnuts and sycamores. As the wayfarer pushes westward, the oak drops back, then the sycamore follows the walnut, and finally the elm disappears, until three hundred miles to the westward the horizon of the "gently rolling" prairie is serrated by the scraggy cottonwood, that rises awkwardly by some sandbarred stream oozing over the moundy land. Another fifty miles, and a Garden City, high up on the background of the panorama, even the cottonwood staggers; and here and there, around some sinkhole in the great flat prairie, droops a desolate willow—the last weary pilgrim from the lowlands.

When the traveler has mounted to this high table land, nearly four hundred miles from the Missouri, he may walk for days without seeing any green thing higher than his head. He may journey for hours on horseback, and not climb a hill, seeing before him only the level and often barren plain, scarred now and then by irrigation ditches.

The even line of the horizon is seldom marred. The silence of such a scene gnaws the glamor from the heart. Men become harsh and hard; women grow withered and sodden under its blighting power. The song of wood birds is not heard; even the mournful plaint of the meadow lark loses its sentiment, where the dreary clanking drone of the windmill is the one song which really brings good tidings with it. Long and fiercely sounds this unrhythmical monody in the night, when the traveler lies down to rest in the little sun-burned, pine-board town. The gaunt arms of the wheel hurl its imprecations at him as he rises to resume his journey into the silence, under the great gray dome, with its canopy pegged tightly down about him everywhere.

Crops are as bountiful in Kansas as elsewhere on the globe. It is the constant [illegible] cold, coming from this plateau—only a small part of the state—which reaches the world's ears, and the world blames Kansas. The fair springs on these highlands lure homeseekers to their ruin.

Hundreds of men and women have been tempted to death or worse, by this Lorelei of the prairies.

A young man named Burkholder came out to Fountain county in 1885. He had been a well-to-do young fellow in Illinois, was a graduate of an inland college, a man of good judgment, or sense, of a well-arranged mental perspective. In 1885 money was plentiful. He stocked his farm, put on a mortgage, and brought a wife back from the home of his boyhood. She was a young woman of culture, who put a bookshelf in the corner of the best of the three rooms in the yellow pine shanty, in which she and her husband lived. She brought her upright piano, and adorned her bedroom floor with bright rugs. She bought magazines at the "Post Office Book Store" of the praire town. She was not despondent. The vast stretches of green cheered her through the hot summer. There was a novel fascination in the wide, treeless horizon which charmed her for a while. At first she never tired of glancing up from her work, through the south window of the kitchen, to see the level green stretches, and the road that merged into the distance. She sat in the shade of the house, and wrote home cheerful, rollicking letters. As for roughing it, she enjoyed it thoroughly.

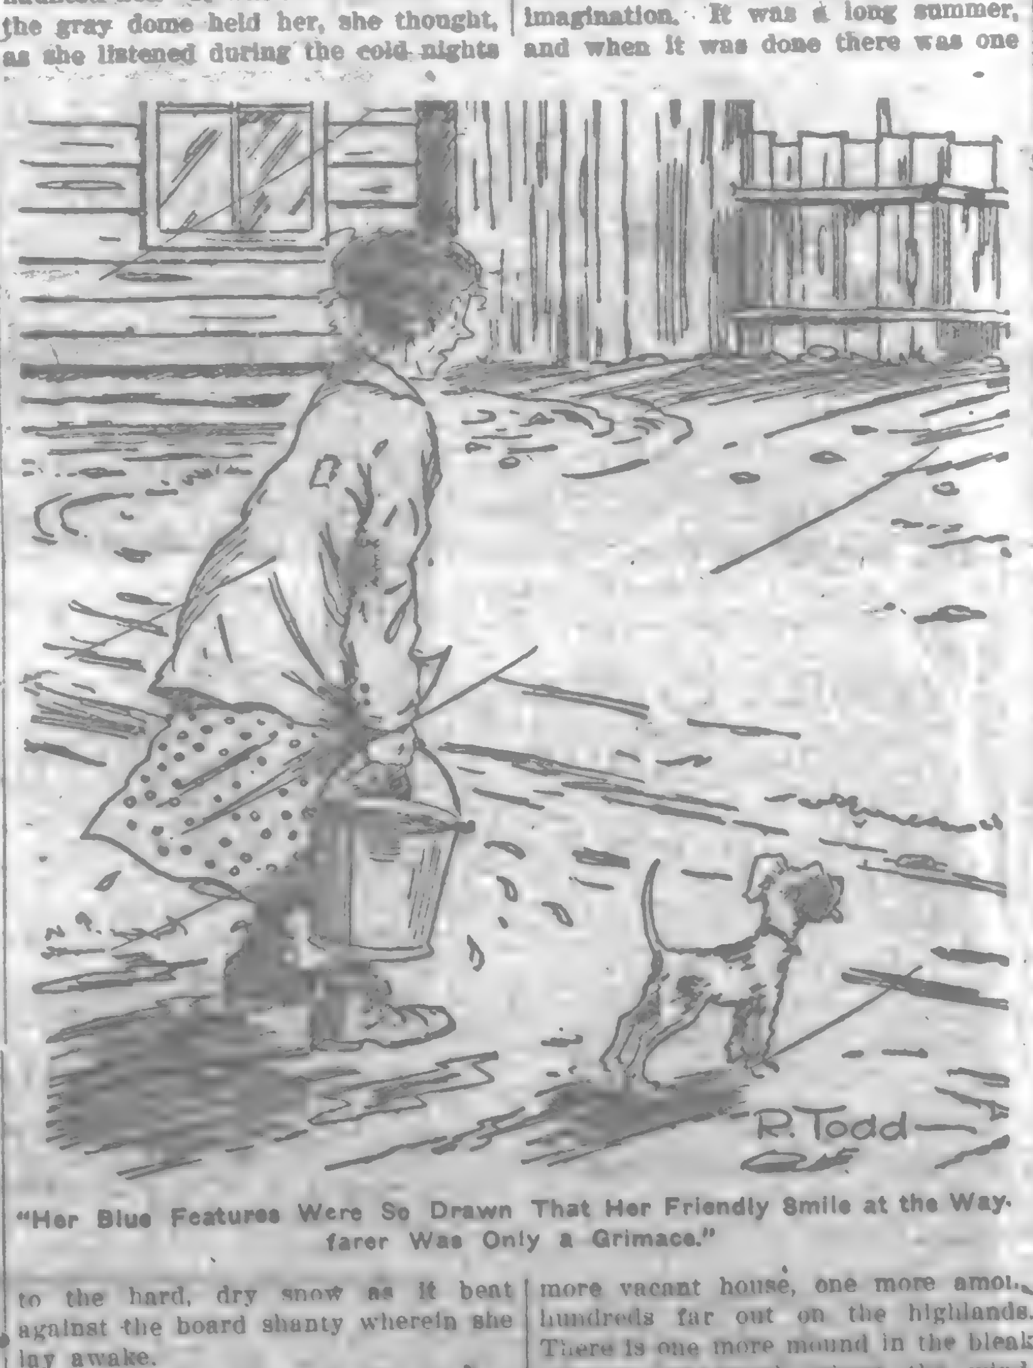
The crops did not quite pay the expenses of the year; so "Thomas Burkholder and Lizzie his wife" put another mortgage on the farm. The books and magazines from home still adorned the best room. And all through the winter and spring the prevailing spirits of the community buoyed up the young people. It was during the summer of [illegible] that the first hot winds came. They [illegible] everything. [illegible]

There is not a tree anywhere in sight, and as the government requires that we should plant trees on our place, as a partial payment for it, I was so in hopes that these would do well. They are burned up now. You don't know how lonesome it seems without trees."

She did not tell the home folk that her piano and the books had gone to buy provisions for the winter. She did not tell the home folk that she had not bought a new dress since she left Illinois. She did not let her petty cares burden her letter. She wrote of generalities. "You do not know how I miss the hills. Tom and I rode twenty miles yesterday, to a place called the Taylor bottom. It is a deep sink-hole, perhaps fifty feet deep, containing about ten square acres. By getting down into this we have the effect of hills. You cannot know how good and snug, and tucked in and 'comfy' it seemed. It is so naked at the house with the knife-edge on the horizon, and only the sky over you. Tom and I have been busy. I haven't had time to read the story in the magazine you sent me. Tom can't get corduroys out here. You should see him in overalls."

Mrs. Burkholder helped her husband look after the cattle. The hired man went away in the early fall. This she did not write home, either. All through the winter days she heard the keen wind whistle around the house, and when she was alone a dread blanched her face. The great gray dome seemed to be holding her its prisoner. She felt chained under it. She shut her eyes and strove to get away from it in fancy, to think of green hills and woodland; but her eyes tore themselves open, and with a hypnotic terror she went to the window, where the prairie thrall bound her again in its chains.

The cemetery for the prairie town had been started during the spring before, and some one had planted therein a solitary cottonwood sapling. Its two dead, gaunt branches seemed to be beckoning her, and all day she thought she heard the winds shriek through the new iron fences around the graves and through the grass that grew wild about the dead. The scene haunted her. It was for this end that the gray dome held her, she thought, as she listened during the cold nights to the hard, dry snow as it beat against the board shanty wherein she lay awake.



"Her Blue Features Were So Drawn That Her Friendly Smile at the Wayfarer Was Only a Grimace."

In the spring the mover's caravan filed by the house, starting eastward before planting time. When the train of wagons had passed the year before, Mrs. Burkholder had been amused by the fantastic legends, which the wagon covers—white, clean, prosperous—had borne. "Kansas or bust," they used to read when headed westward. "Busted" was the laconic legend, written under the old motto on their first eastward trip. "Going back to wife's folks," had been a common jocose motto at first. Mrs. Burkholder and her husband had laughed over this the year before, but this year as she saw the long file out of the west into the east, she missed the banners. She noticed, with a mental pang, that those who came out of the country this year seemed to be thankful to get out at all. There were [illegible]

after planting time in 1889, the land was gloriously green. But before July the promises had been mocked by the hiss of the hot wind in the dead grass. That fall one of their horses died.

Saturday after Saturday Burkholder went to the prairie town and brought home groceries and coal. It was a source of constant terror to him that some day his wife might ask him how he got these supplies. She hid it from herself as long as she could. All winter they would not admit to each other that they were living on "aid." On many a gray, blustering afternoon, when Burkholder was in the village getting provisions, a straggler on the road might see his wife coming around the house, with two buckets of water in her hands, the water splashing against her feet, which were encased in a pair of her husband's old shoes, the wind pushing her thin calico skirts against her stiff limbs and her frail body bent stiffly in the man's coat that she wore. Her arms and shoulders seemed to shiver and crouch with the cold, and her blue features were so drawn that her friendly smile at the wayfarer was only a grimace.

In the spring many men in Fountain county went East looking for work. They left their wives with God and the county commissioners. Burkholder dumbly went with them. In March, the covered wagon-train began to file past the Burkholder house. By April it was a continuous line—shabby, tattered, rickety, dying. Here came a wagon covered with bed quilts, there another topped with oilcloth table covers; another followed, patched with everything. For two years the mover's caravan trailing across the plains had taken the shape of a huge dust-colored serpent in the woman's fancy; now it seemed to Mrs. Burkholder that the terrible creature was withering away, that this was its skeleton. The treeless landscape worried her more and more; the steel dome seemed set tighter over her, and she sat thirsting for water in the landscape.

After a month's communion with her fancies, Mrs. Burkholder nailed a black rag over the kitchen window. But the arms of the dead sapling in the cemetery gyrated wildly in her sick imagination. It was a long summer, and when it was done there was one more vacant house, one more among hundreds far out on the highlands. There is one more mound in the bleak country graveyard, where the wind, shrieking through the iron fences and the crackling, dead cottonwood branches, has never learned a slumber song to sob for a tired soul. But there are times when the wind seems to moan upon its sun-parched chords like the cry of some lone spirit groping its tangled way back to the lowlands, the green pastures, the still waters, and to the peace that passeth understanding.

Traveling Trout.

No company of anglers can long be together without having a discussion regarding the sea trout and what manner of fish he really is. According to the [illegible] view a sea trout is merely a trout which has been to sea and come back again. LITTLE BLACK SQUEALER

He was a little black pig, scarcely a month old and he had been sent as a present to a head keeper in a zoo. Later he was going to be taken to a nice farm, but for the present he was enjoying his zoo home.

He had a nice little house and whenever any one came near him he would grunt as hard as he could, for he was a little lonely by himself and animals talk more when they are lonely, you know.

Then they will make many sounds, but when they are together and contented they are very quiet.

"Why talk," most of them seem to feel, "when we're perfectly satisfied?"

But the little pig loved the sound of a human voice and so he grunted when anyone came near him, for he wanted to talk when there was so little opportunity for doing so.

Of course he squealed when he was excited, but grunting noises were the ones he made at all other times.

He was gentle, for pigs are very nice that way—they do not wish to do anyone harm.

He had been named Little Black Squealer and he seemed to like his name.

Every day he was given bran and milk and every morning the goats in the zoo let him have a quart of their fine milk. Oh yes, the goats were very obliging and helpful in the zoo.

Sometimes Little Black Sqealer was given warm milk, but he would not be eating grass or weeds or vegetables for several months to come. He was too young for such food.

Now a friend of the keeper's went to visit Little Black Squealer and what a time they had!

There were three of them having a chat together, Little Black Squealer, a keeper and the visitor.

Now Little Black Squealer had bran and milk over the floor of his house and so excited was he when he found he was having visitors that he rushed along his floor and slipped so that some of the bran and milk hit the visitor.

But it did not hurt her and she was delighted at the eagerness and nice cordial ways of Little Black Squealer.

He got up on his hind feet and put his front ones against the boards of his house and when he thought his visitors were going to leave and pay attention to some of the other animals he grunted so fast and so hard just to let them know that he did wish they would stay with him a little longer.

"On His Hind Feet."

And so they did!

He enjoyed being played with and he grunted with delight at the fun and attention he was having.

When he was held he did not like it so much and squealed in his funny shrill little way.

For pigs do not care about being held.

But he was willing and ready to be made a pet of and he was ready to promise that he would follow his keeper around, which promise he would have kept, for he was anxious to be a pet.

He did not bother much about sleeping, for he was so young and the world was so new to him and he wanted to see and do all he [illegible]

Later on, when [illegible] less new and less exciting he [illegible] more.

He had never [illegible] before in his little life.

And the keeper and the visitor taught the little pig the delights of back scratching, by scratching his for him.

TIP OFFERED TO DENTISTS

Writer Thinks Practice Might Mitigate the Horrors of Tooth-Pulling Operations.

A new idea for dentists.

If you've never had a tooth pulled don't read this suggestion, for it's beyond the comprehension of such. Far!

One certain friend of a certain dentist in this city, having read a delicious dissertation on the pulling of teeth via the novocaine method, happened upon the end of the story, in which the dentist said: "That's all. Perhaps you'd better have a little stimulant."

By way of suggestion to the local dentist his friend wrote: "By introducing this innovation there is no doubt but that you can soon take over the entire building for your practice. Of course, the technique of extraction will be lengthened. One pull by the dentist to be followed by one pull by the patient, and then, I suppose, a long pull all together."—Washington Star.

Evidently Christians.

An American family living in China recently hired two servants from Nanking, a missionary center. Accordingly, the new servants were Christians. Another Chinese servant in the family discovered the newcomers' religion and reported the fact to his mistress. Asked how he knew the new boys were Christians, he said: "Oh, they know all about God, Jesus Christ, and Santa Claus."

American Farm Bureau

Michigan State Farm Bureau, Lansing, Michigan.

Michigan farmers say "Our farm bureau is SOME hired man."

The activities of the Michigan Farm Bureau federation have been as varied as they have been beneficial. By one act—that of blocking temporarily the abandonment of railroad branches—the farm bureau did a splendid service in transportation for its members.

The purchasing department of the Michigan Farm Bureau federation saved $7,500 to its members by purchase of 1,500,000 pounds of binder twine. A big saving was made also in the purchase of sulphate of ammonia. Fifty-one cars of coal were purchased when this fuel was hard to get.

The 1921 wool pool paid off, netting the poolers an average of 19 cents.

Two hundred thousand pounds of certified Grimm alfalfa seed were purchased for members since January 1, 1922. The Michigan Farm Bureau maintains a seed-cleaning plant that is used by thousands of its members.

The first week of the produce exchange, just started, $5,305 worth of produce was marketed at a saving.

The farmers of Michigan pay $10 a year for their membership fee. All of these services are included and they are satisfied that it is one of the best $10 that they ever spent.

EUROPEAN FARMER IS MAKING BIG HEADWAY

Samuel Adams Returns From Extended Trip and Tells Interesting Story of Conditions.

Land in Europe is passing from the control of the landed gentry, the big landlords, to the peasant small holders, the farmers who actually till it. Europe is rapidly returning to normal food production. Germany is bound to come back economically. Russia will have grain to export within two years. Co-operative marketing is being perfected by European farmers until it is the dominant feature of both the economic and political structure over there.

These are the conclusions of Samuel Adams, scion of the famous Adams family which gave us two presidents, who has returned from Europe after several months spent studying co-operative marketing and the agricultural situation. Mr. Adams carried a commission from the American Farm bureau which gained him ready access to the heads of the government in all the countries visited—England, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Poland, Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, France, Holland and Belgium.

Samuel Adams.

Mr. Adams says: "In every country which I visited I found that the farmer was regarded as the great stabilizing force. For that reason the governments, whether radical or socialistic, red or white, see the necessity of giving the peasant a real ownership in the land he works. In all these countries new laws are being passed so that the peasant may purchase his small holding and owe fealty to none except the government. In Scandinavia [illegible] [illegible] the farmer [illegible] a [illegible]. This takes [illegible].

"The [illegible]

[illegible] is making great headway in all these countries except England. In Britain consumers' co-operation under the Rochdale plan is highly successful, but the British farmers are too individualistic and have too attractive markets right at their back doors to stick loyally by their collective selling societies.

"The farmers in Denmark and the other Scandinavian countries have developed co-operative marketing to a high point. It has changed the whole face of the country, not only squeezing the profit out of distribution but also resulting in better farming and improved production.

"The most unforgettable incident of the trip was the Passion Play at Oberammergau. Mrs. Adams and I came away feeling that no one could witness that great pantomime of the life of Jesus without resolving to live a better life, more earnestly devoted to serving one's fellows. If everyone could see the Passion Play there would not be so much trouble in this world of ours."

HOWARD IS HEARD BY RADIO

Farmers Attending Picnic at Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, Listen to Executive by Wireless.

"They ain't no sech animal" was not meant for the last decade. It is not safe to make any sort of a negative statement with regard to what will or will not happen these days.

Take for instance a big farm bureau picnic held the other day at Fond du Lac, Wis., when 5,000 farm bureau members met to have a good time. Ten years ago no one would have thought of having the president of the American Farm Bureau federation speak to them by radio. And yet that is just what happened at Fond du Lac.

President James R. Howard of the American Farm Bureau federation talked by radio to the farm bureau members there. Here, in part, is what he said:

"By one of the greatest industrial miracles the world has ever seen—radio—I am permitted to speak to you, through the air, without wires. What may this new means of thought transmission not hold of progress and advancement for us who live on the farms of America! Perhaps no other movement in the history of the world has made so rapid progress within the short span of ten years as has the farm bureau. It is entirely within bounds of propriety to say that no other movement has so impressed the general public, or accomplished as large results as has yours."

GOOD ROADS

TRACTIVE ROAD RESISTANCE

Initial Results Secured Show That Information Will Be of Big Value to Engineer.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Initial results secured from an investigation of the tractive resistance of roads indicate that information will be secured of great value to the highway engineer and the user of motor transport. The investigations are being carried on under the auspices of the advisory board on highway research of the national research council with which the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, and the quartermaster corps, United States army are co-operating.

One phase of the investigation shows that there is a great difference in the power required of the engine when a truck is traveling over different types of surfacing, the amount being more than twice as great on some of the lower types when compared with that on higher types. It is also shown that the power required to overcome the road resistance is not proportional to the speed of the vehicle, and after a certain speed is reached increases very rapidly.

The investigation when complete will cover tests with various types of motor vehicles with the load, tire and spring equipment varied on different types of surfacing and at varying speeds. The data will include gasoline consumption, internal engine resistance, wind resistance, and road-surface resistance.

When carefully analyzed it will aid the highway engineer in determining under a given set of conditions what type of surface should be built for a given volume of traffic to result in the least total cost for road and vehicle operation. The same sort of study will be made as to expenditures for grade reduction to reduce operating costs.

Great Difference in Power Required of Engine When Truck Is Traveling Over Different Types of Surfacing.

The truck operator will be given valuable information on the effect of tire and spring equipment, lubrication, size of load and speed of vehicle on fuel consumption which should aid him in producing cheaper transportation.

STRETCH OF MODEL HIGHWAY

Ideal Section of Lincoln Road Under Construction in Lake County, Indiana, Near Chicago.

A stretch of model road, to be known as the ideal section of the Lincoln highway, is under construction in Lake county, Indiana, to the southeast of Chicago.

Besides a 40-foot road bed ten inches thick, designed to carry heavy traffic, provisions are made for beautification of the roadside in boulevard fashion. A lighting system is to be installed. The entire cost will range approximately $100,000 a mile.

This strip of roadway is centrally located, as far as traffic on the Lincoln highway is concerned, and is intended to serve as a model for the gradual evolution of the entire route as traffic volume increases. The Lincoln Highway association will provide the funds required over the usual costs per mile.

She Cherishes The "News"

Many of our far-off subscribers often write back and express their appreciation of the old home paper. Not only do they write directly to the publisher, but to relatives and friends who live here. The one we are referring to now is Mrs. L. V. Dunn at 7127 Harvard Ave., Chicago, Illinois, who sent in a letter to her brother, Howard Northup, a short time ago a clipping in the form of a poem which, she stated, expressed her appreciation of the St. Joe News.

Mrs. Dunn was raised in the vicinity of St. Joe and lived here until she was about twenty years old. It is true she does not know all the people whose names appear weekly in the columns of the "News" but she delights in reading the paper for those names she is familiar with.

The poem reads:

It's like a smiling friendly face.
It's like a voice you long have known,
You see it in some distant place
And rush to claim it for your own

The paper from your old home town
Has bridged the long and weary miles
And with it you can settled down
Among familiar tears and smiles.

It speaks for every friend you know,
It tells of scenes you yearn to see;
It brings back joys of long ago.
And tells of joys that are to be,

And as you run its columns o'er
Your yesterdays, come trooping back;
You fancy you are at home once more,
And golden seem the letters black.

Its speech is one you understand.
It tells of griefs that you can share,
It brings you in that foreign land,
Glad messages to banish care.

There among scenes and faces strange,
The old home paper seems to be
The faithful friend that doesn't change,
A friend that you are glad to see

I know not just what heaven is like,
Nor just what joys beyond life's tide
Await for me, when death shall strike.
And I shall reach the other side,

But this I know when I have gone
To dwell in realms divinely fair,
My soul will yearn to look upon
The old home paper over there.

—14—

"It can't be possible!" he muttered, bending farther over. "Such a thing happens too rarely—"

His heart pounded violently; excitement sent the blood rushing to his brain in blinding swirls. He was gripped by the gold fever that comes upon a man when he makes the astounding discovery of untold wealth lying at his feet, passed over and disregarded by other and less-discerning men for days and years!

It was oil, no question about it. An extremely slight quantity, true; so slight a quantity that there was no film on the water, no discernible taste to the water. Gramont brought it to his mouth and rose, shaking his head.

Where did it come from? It had no connection with the gas bubbles—at least, it did not come from the dome of water and gas. How long he stood there staring Gramont did not know. His brain was afire with the possibilities. At length he stirred into action and started up the bayou bank, from time to time halting to search the water below him, to make sure that he could still discern the faint iridescence.

He followed it rod by rod, and found that it rapidly increased in strength. It must come from some very tiny surface seepage close at hand, that was lost in the bayou almost as rapidly as it came from the earth-depths. Only accidentally would a man see it—not unless he were searching the water close to the bank, and even then only by the grace of chance.

Suddenly Gramont saw that he had lost the sign. He halted.

No, not lost, either! Just ahead of him was a patch of reeds, and a recession of the shore. He advanced again. Inside the reeds he found the oily smear, still so faint that he could only detect it at certain angles. Glancing up, he could see a fence at a little distance, evidently the boundary fence of the Ledanois land; the bushes and trees thinned out here, and on ahead was cleared ground. He saw, through the bushes, glimpses of buildings.

Violent disappointment seized him. Was he to lose this discovery, after all? Was he to find that the seepage came from ground belonging to some one else? No—he stepped back hastily, barely in time to avoid stumbling into a tiny trickle of water, a rivulet that ran down into the bayou, a tributary so insignificant that it was invisible ten feet distant! And on the surface a faint iridescence.

Excitement rising anew within him, Gramont turned and followed this rivulet, his eyes aflame with eagerness. It led him for twenty feet, and ceased abruptly, in a bubbling spring that welled from a patch of low tree-inclosed land. Gramont felt his feet sinking in grass, and saw that there was a dip in the ground hereabouts, a swampy little section all to itself. He picked a dry spot and lay down on his face, searching the water with his eyes.

Moment after moment he lay there, watching. Presently he found the slight trickle of oil again—a trickle so faint and slim that even here, on the surface of the tiny rivulet, it could be discerned only with great difficulty. A very thin seepage, concluded Gramont; a thin oil, of course. So faint a little thing, to mean so much!

It came from the Ledanois land, no doubt of it. What did that matter, though? His eyes widened with flaming thoughts as he gazed down at the slender thread of water. No matter at all where this came from—the main point was proven by it! There was oil here for the finding, oil down in the thousands of feet below, oil so thick and abundant that it forced itself up through the earth fissures to find an outlet!

"Instead of going down five or six thousand feet," he thought, exultantly, "we may have to go down only as many hundred. But first we must get an option or a lease on all the land roundabout—all we can secure! There will be a tremendous boom the minute this news breaks. If we get those options, we can sell them over again at a million per cent profit, and even if we don't strike oil in paying quantities, we'll regain the cost of our drilling! And to think of the years this has been here, waiting for some one—"

Suddenly he started violently. An abrupt crashing of feet among the bushes, an outbreak of voices, had sounded not far away—just the other side of the boundary fence. He was wakened from his dreams, and started to rise. Then he relaxed his muscles and lay quiet, astonishment seizing him; for he heard his own name mentioned in a voice that was strange to him.

CHAPTER X.

[illegible]

alarm. "Look here, sheriff, it wasn't me done it! It was Gramont—"

There came silence. Not a sound broke the stillness of the late afternoon.

Gramont, listening, lay bewildered and breathless. Ben Chacherre come here? Gramont knew nothing of any tie between Jachin Fell and Chacherre; he could only lie in the grass and wonder at the man's presence. What "place" was it that the sheriff of Houma had been looking over? And what was it that he, Gramont, was supposed to have done?

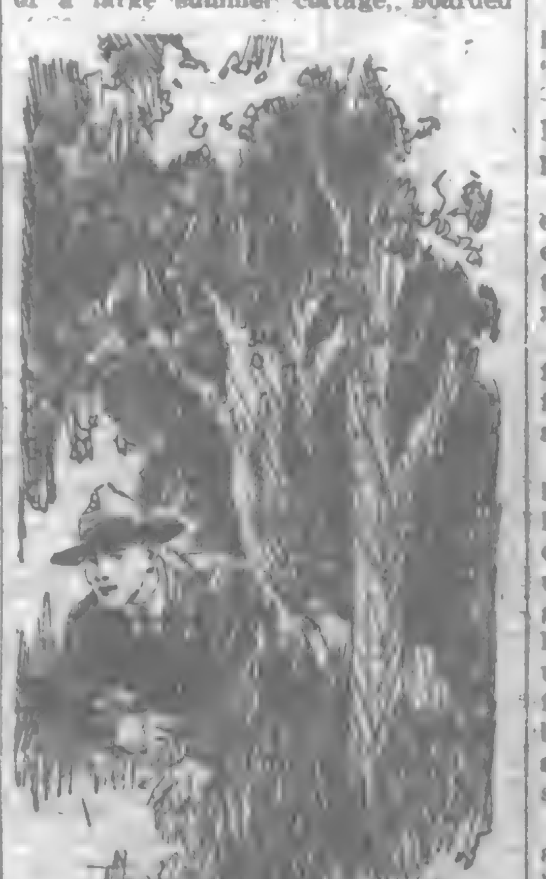
Confused and wondering, Gramont waited. And, as he waited, he caught a soft sound from the marshy ground beside him—a faint "plop" as though some object had fallen close by on the wet grass. At the moment he paid no heed to this sound, for again the uncanny silence had fallen.

Listening, Gramont fancied that he caught slow, stealthy footsteps amid the undergrowth, but derided the fancy as sheer imagination. His brain was busy with this new problem. Houma, he knew, was the seat of the parish or county. This Ben Chacherre appeared to have suddenly and unexpectedly encountered the sheriff, to his obvious alarm, and the sheriff had for some reason decided to arrest him; so much was clear.

Chacherre had nothing to do with the "place"—did that mean the adjacent property, or the Ledanois farm? In his puzzled bewilderment over this imbroglio Gramont for the moment quite forgot the trickle of oil at his feet.

But now the deep silence became unnatural and sinister. What had happened? Surely, Ben Chacherre had not been arrested and taken away in such silence! Why had the voices so abruptly ceased? Vaguely uneasy, startled by the prolongation of that intense stillness, Gramont rose to his feet and peered among the trees.

The two speakers seemed to have departed; he could descry nobody in sight. A step to one side gave Gramont a view of the land adjoining the Ledanois place. This was cleared of all brush, and under some immense oaks to the far left he had a glimpse of a large summer cottage, boarded up and apparently deserted. Nearer at hand, however, he saw other buildings, and these drew his attention. He heard the throbbing pound of a motor at work, and as there was no power line along here, the place evidently had its own electrical plant. He scrutinized the scene before him appraisingly.



An Abrupt Crashing of Feet Among the Bushes, an Outbreak of Voices, Had Sounded Not Far Away.

There were two large buildings here. One seemed to be a large barn, closed, the other was a long, low shed which was too large to be a garage. The door of this was open, and before the opening Gramont saw three men standing in talk; he recognized none of them. Two of the talkers were clad in greasy overalls, and the third figure showed the flash of a collar. The sheriff, Ben Chacherre and some other man, thought Gramont. He would not have known Chacherre had he encountered him face to face. To him, the man was a name only.

The mention of his own name by Chacherre [illegible]

a couple o' fish for supper," announced the chauffeur, grinning. "Got things cleaned up fine, cap'n! You won't know the old shack."

"Good enough," said Gramont. "Here, step over this way! I want to show you something."

He led Hammond to the rivulet and pointed out the thin film of oil on the surface.

"There's our golden fortune, sergeant! Oil actually coming out of the ground! It doesn't happen very often, but it does happen and this is one of the times. I'll not bother to look around any farther."

"Glory be!" said Hammond, staring at the rivulet. "Want to hit back for town?"

"No; we couldn't get back until some time tonight, and the roads aren't very good for night work. I'm going to get some leases around here—perhaps I can do it right away, and we'll start back in the morning. Go ahead and get your fish."

Regaining the house, he saw that Hammond had indeed cleaned up in great style, and had the main room looking clean as a pin, with a fire popping on the hearth. He did not pause here, but went to the car, got in, and started it. He drove back to the road and followed this toward town for a few rods, turning in at a large and very decent-looking farmhouse that he had observed while passing it on the way out.

He found the owner, an intelligent-appearing Creole, driving in some cows for milking, and was a little startled to realize that the afternoon was so late. When he addressed the farmer in French, he received a cordial reply, and discovered that this man owned the land across the road from the Ledanois place—that his farm, in fact, covered several hundred acres.

"Who owns the land next to the Ledanois place?" inquired Gramont.

"I sold that off my land a couple of years ago," replied the other. "A man from New Orleans wanted it for a summer place—a business man there, Isidore Gumberts."

Gumberts—"Memphis Izzy" Gumberts! The name flashed to Gramont's mind, and brought the recollection of a conversation with Hammond. Why, Gumberts was the famous crook of whom Hammond had spoken.

"I saw the sheriff a while ago, heading up the road," observed the Creole. "Did you meet him?"

Gramont shook his head. "No, but I saw several men at the Gumberts place. Perhaps he was there—"

"Not there, I guess," and the farmer laughed. "Those fellows have rented the place from Gumberts, I hear; they're inventors, and quiet enough men. You're a stranger here?"

Gramont introduced himself as a friend of Miss Ledanois, and stated frankly that he was looking for oil and hoped to drill on her land.

"I'd like a lease option from you," he went on. "I don't want to buy your land at all; what I want is a right to drill for oil on it, in case any shows up on Miss Ledanois' land. It's all a gamble, you know. I'll give you a hundred dollars for the lease, and the usual eighth interest in any oil that's found. I've no lease blanks with me, but if you'll give me the option, a signed memorandum will be entirely sufficient."

The farmer regarded oil as a joke, and said so. The hundred dollars, however, and the prospective eighth interest, were sufficient to induce him to part with the option without any delay. He was only too glad to get the thing done with at once, and to pocket Gramont's money.

Gramont drove away, and was just coming to the Ledanois drive when he suddenly threw on the brakes and halted the car, listening. From somewhere ahead of him—the Gumberts place, he thought instantly—echoed a shot, and several faint shouts. Then silence again.

Gramont paused, indecisive. The sheriff was making an arrest, he thought. A hundred possibilities flitted through his brain, suggested by the [illegible] of Memphis Izzy known [illegible] to Hammond as a [illegible], with this [illegible] "inventors." [illegible]

Sunday School ' Lesson '

(By REV. P. B. FITZWATER, D. D., Teacher of English Bible in the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.)

LESSON FOR OCTOBER 22

JESUS TEMPTED

LESSON TEXT—Luke 4:1-13.

GOLDEN TEXT—For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succor them that are tempted.—Heb. 2:18.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Phil. 2:5-11; Heb. 4:14-16; 4:14-16.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Overcomes Temptation.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Tempted to Do Wrong.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Overcoming Temptation.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—What Christ's Victory Means to Us.

I. The Place of (v. 1).

The wilderness of Judea. The first man, Adam, was tempted in a garden with the most pleasant surroundings. The second man, Jesus Christ, was tempted in a barren wilderness surrounded by wild beasts (Mark 1:13).

II. The Purpose of (v. 1). He was led into a wilderness by the Spirit. Christ's temptation was Messianic. Though He was "tempted in all points like as we are," we are not tempted as He was in this instance, but the same methods are employed on us. During the eighteen years of retirement Satan surely tempted Christ as he tempts us. Satan, no doubt, would have gladly escaped this hour, but the time had come for the Redeemer to enter upon His mediatorial work; therefore He went from the place of anointing and heavenly recognition as the Son of God to meet and despoil the arch enemy (Heb. 2:14).

1. It was not a preparation for His work, but rather its first conflict. In baptism we have the symbolic act of dedication of himself to the work of redemption through the cross—the making full a righteousness. In the temptation, the strong man is spoiling the enemy.

2. It was not to see if Christ would stand fast—would fail under the most crucial test. Christ could not fail. To so postulate would make God's scheme of redemption to have been unsettled until after this temptation, and would have made God guilty of setting forth a scheme of redemption on the basis of a possible overthrow.

3. It was to show Christ as an object upon which we may rest our faith with unshaken confidence. He came as the second Man, the head of a new race, its very source and life. It was a demonstration of the inseparableness of the divine and human natures in the incarnation.

III. The Method of (vv. 2-12).

Christ as the world's Redeemer sustained a threefold relation—Son of Man; Son of God; and Messiah, therefore Satan made each one a ground of attack.

1. As Son of Man (vv. 2-4). Satan made his first assault upon Him as a man by appealing to the instinct of hunger. Satan urged Him to use His divine power and convert a stone into bread. Hunger is natural and sinless. The temptation was in satisfying a right hunger in a wrong way. To have yielded in this case would have been to renounce the human limitations which He had taken for our sakes. To use divine power to satisfy human needs would have been to fail as Saviour and Redeemer.

2. As Messiah (vv. 5-8). Here the temptation was to grasp His rightful dominion by false means. The devil offered to surrender unto Him the world if He would worship him. The force of this temptation was in the fact that the kingdoms of the world are Christ's by God's covenant with Him. God's method by which Jesus was to possess the world was the cross. The temptation Satan is pressing upon the church today is to get possession of the world by other means than the cross.

3. As Son of God (vv. 9-12). Here Satan tries to induce Christ to presume upon God's care. [illegible] a Messianic [illegible] so act. To do [illegible] in order to get [illegible] Satan's temptation. [illegible]

Moveable Mark.

A player and his caddy started off from the first tee. The man's drive had hooked badly into the rough. They hunted for the ball for some time and then the man turned to the boy and said: "Caddy, did you mark my ball?" "Yes," he answered, "I marked it." "What by?" asked the man. "By a bird," said the boy, "but it flew away."—Judge.

INDIANA BREVITIES

Anderson.—The Anderson Trust company was appointed receiver for Charles F. Wiley & Co., of Elwood, on the application of Mrs. Ethel Wilton, also of Elwood, in the Madison county Superior court, and the receiver was ordered by the court to take charge of all property of the defendant company, which includes a department store at Elwood. Mrs. Wilton asserted in her complaint that in 1920 she bought $1,000 preferred stock in the Wiley company and that she wished a receiver to establish her right because she averred her offer to return the stock in order to recover the money she paid for it had been refused by the defendant. She further alleged that the defendant is in danger of insolvency.

Valparaiso.—An extensive road building program for Porter county has been announced by the county commissioners. The main arteries between towns in the county will be paved with concrete over their present foundations, as an investigating body learned has been done successfully in Lake county. The new roads, which will take two years to build, will make Valparaiso the hub of good roads leading to Kouts, Hebron, Chesterton, Wheeler and Hobart.

Crawfordsville.—Enrollment of students at Wabash college for the first week of the fall semester totals 446. This is practically the mark set last year. Of this number, 206 are students enrolled in the freshman class. Not all of this number, however, are new students, as perhaps 20 of this year's freshman class are men who enrolled last fall, but dropped out of school. Three hundred and forty are members of the three upper classes.

Scipio.—In the results of an egg-laying contest at Scipio, conducted by Fred Potts, county agent, a flock of Brown Leghorns, owned by Gus L. Klayer, holds first prize, having averaged 141.16 eggs since March 1. In connection with the contest 30 culling demonstrations have been held over the county, with an average attendance of fifty. Methods of housing, care of hens and the rations fed are those recommended by the state experimental school of Purdue university.

Indianapolis.—Under a law passed by the last state legislature, this year's voters' roll will become permanent. Never again, as long as the present law remains on the statute books, will all the voters be required to register. Those changing address and new voters, however, will have the opportunity of correcting the permanent enrollment.

Marion.—An all-day conference of the Marion district of the White River conference of the U. B. church was held at the First U. B. church in this city. Among the speakers were R. S. Parr, Wabash; R. E. Weber, Lincolnville; C. R. Archer, Montpelier; C. E. Smith, Marion, and Dr. J. R. Parsons, conference superintendent.

Seymour.—A committee of business men has announced plans for the annual municipal Halloween festivities here. Prizes are to be awarded for the best costumes appearing in parade. The celebration is to be given in downtown streets, so that closer supervision can be kept over the celebration.

Greencastle.—Dr. George R. Grose, president of DePauw university, has announced the completion of the fund for the endowment of the James Whitcomb Riley chair of English literature at DePauw university. Lafayette.—Extensive research work of great value to the public highway system of the United States will be undertaken within a short time by the engineering experiment station of Purdue university in co-operation with the United States bureau of public roads. The tests will include effects of different kinds of tires on the roads; the effect of various sized loads and the different types of concrete construction. Two federal engineers will be assigned to Purdue shortly to make these tests in co-operation with the Purdue engineers, according to Dean A. A. Potter, director of the engineering experimental work, who arranged for the work.

Greenburg.—Plans are being considered by the Big Four Railroad company to deepen the 15-acre lake at the west edge of Greenburg, in order that a recurrence of a water famine may be averted. The lake will be dug several feet deeper, probably doubling its capacity, it is said. Two small streams feed this lake. At present the greater part of the lake is dry. Water from this lake is pumped to the local railway yards for engine use.

Hundreds of sets of unused harness and several hundred lots, including thousands of items, were sold to jobbers. Buyers from all over the country attended. If You Need a Medicine You Should Have the Best

Have you ever stopped to reason why it is that so many products that are extensively advertised, all at once drop out of sight and are soon forgotten? The reason is plain—the article did not fulfill the promises of the manufacturer. This applies more particularly to a medicine. A medicinal preparation that has real curative value almost sells itself, as like an endless chain system the remedy is recommended by those who have been benefited to those who are in need of it.

A prominent druggist says, "Take for example Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a preparation I have sold for many years and never hesitate to recommend, for in almost every case it shows excellent results, as many of my customers testify. No other kidney remedy has so large a sale."

According to sworn statements and verified testimony of thousands who have used the preparation, the success of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is due to the fact, so many people claim, that it fulfills almost every wish in overcoming kidney, liver and bladder ailments, corrects urinary troubles and neutralizes the uric acid which causes rheumatism.

You may receive a sample bottle of Swamp-Root by parcel post. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and enclose ten cents; also mention this paper. Large and medium size bottles for sale at all drug stores.—Advertisement.

DESIGNED FOR HIGH PLACE

Sandy's Prediction for Son's Future, However, Contained One Rather Unfortunate Proviso.

In Scotland there is told a story of one Sandy McIntosh, who started to build a small outhouse of brick. After the usual plan of bricklayers he worked from the inside, and, as he had the material close beside him, the walls were rising fast when noon arrived, and with it his son, John, who brought his father's dinner.

With honest pride in his eye, Sandy looked at John over the wall on which he was engaged, and asked:

"How de ye think I am gettin' on?"

"Fine, father; but how dae ye get oot? You've forgot the door?"—

One glance around him showed Sandy that his son was right; but, looking at him kindly, he said:

"Oh, but ye've got a grand heid on ye, John! Ye'll be an architect yet, as sure's yer feyther's a builder!"—Philadelphia Ledger.

HOW TWO WOMEN ESCAPED OPERATIONS

Doctor Advised Use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Happy Results in Both Cases

St. Joseph, Missouri.—"Both of my sides swelled and hurt me so that I could not move or do any of my work. There was heavy pressure and pains through my lower organs and the doctor told me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for these troubles. He said I had this one chance, and if the Vegetable Compound did not help me nothing but an operation would. After taking several bottles I felt it was helping me and now I am able to do my own work. If my testimonial will help others I shall be glad for them to read it and hope your Vegetable Compound will do them as much good as it did me."—Mrs. WM. LOCKMAN, 518 N. 4th St., St. Joseph, Mo.

White Plains, N. Y.—"I had such a pain that I could hardly walk and the doctor said that I needed an operation. I was sick for a year before I started taking your medicine and I could not work. I saw your advertisement in a little book and that is how I came to take Lydia E. Pinkham's medicines. I have been taking the Vegetable Compound and Lydia E. Pinkham's Blood Medicine, also Lydia E. Pinkham's Liver Pills and used Lydia E. Pinkham's Sanative Wash and the capsules and prescription recommended. I am doing all my work and have gained twenty pounds. I am taking the medicines still, but I feel fine. You have my permission to use this letter for the good of others."—Mrs. MARY MARK, 87 Hamilton Ave., White Plains, N. Y.

Some female troubles may through neglect reach a stage when an operation is necessary. But most of the commoner ailments are not the surgical ones; they are not caused by serious displacements, tumors, or growths, although the symptoms may appear the same.

When disturbing ailments first appear, take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to relieve the present distress and prevent more serious troubles. Many letters have been received from women who have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound after operations have been advised by attending physicians.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Private Text-Book upon "Ailments Peculiar to Women" will be sent you free upon request. Write to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Massachusetts. This book contains valuable information.

WESTERN CANADA for Big Wheat Crops

Canada is the world's greatest producer of wheat — second only to the United States—yet only about 12% of the tillable area has been worked. Yields of 40 bushels of wheat per acre are not uncommon. Oats have given as high as 100 bushels per acre, while 40 to 50 bushels per acre are ordinary yields; barley and rye in like proportion. Cattle and horses thrive on the native grasses which grow abundantly and corn and sunflower culture are highly successful.

Stock Raising, Dairying and Mixed Farming

secure for the industrious settler ample returns for his energy. Clearing the cost of one's farm with a single year's crop has an appeal, and has been done by hundreds of Western Canada farmers. Taxes only upon land (not on improvements). Perfect climate, attractive social conditions, good neighbors, churches, schools, telephones, excellent markets and shipping facilities make life happy as well as prosperous.

Handy Airman.

Air navigation will long have its difficult situations, some being typical and some exceptional. Here is one that was handled masterfully the other day in the service between Paris and London. A French pilot carrying passengers after crossing the channel in a driving storm found himself becoming disabled. He wirelessed to an emergency station on the French shore near Calais, and then successfully came down with twelve passengers. Everything was working to meet the emergency. When the plane touched the earth a corps of experts was ready. Within fifteen minutes a new propeller was put on and motor trouble corrected. Off went Pilot Comte Henri de Perignon with his passengers only twelve minutes behind the schedule.

Danger in Osculation.

When one of the Talmadge girls was in Washington some time ago she was being shown through the senate chamber by a well-known Washingtonian. Seeing a rather handsome little page, she leaned forward and impulsively kissed him. I learned the other day that after the story had reached a certain group of young girlie girls the fortunate youngster has been eagerly sought after by those who would emulate the movie screen star's actions. The lad should remember, however, what kissing did for Captain Hobson of Spanish war fame.—Washington Star.

To remove tarnish from silver, put one tablespoonful of borax powder in each quart of water. Put in the silver and bring to boiling point. Wipe with a flannel cloth. It gives a wonderful polish and saves time, labor and silver.

CLASS NOTES

FRESHMEN:

Notice our spelling average. It may be of interest, to the friends of Henry Keesler and Carl Tustison, to know that this week they are largely responsible for our "brilliant showing."

Don't judge us too severely. Its all because we aren't thoroughly accustomed to High School ways The instructors tell us that this excuse is getting thread bare from overwork, so if anyone has a good suggestion for another, please inform Paul Fetters. He will see that it travels.

Now that Miss Schmalsried has learned our "honest to-goodness" names, she is trying to master our nick names. "What is a co-ordinating conjunction Hank—oh! Henry?"

Mr. Maxwell is now giving us lessons on how to talk politics. He is trying to make worthy American citisens of us. Do you thing there is any chance? W. B

SOPHOMORE:

On Thursday of last week a class meeting was called for the purpose of electing class officials. The result of the election is as follows: President, Bessie Layman; Vice-President, Harcourt Miser; Sec. and Treasurer, Paul Hadsell Class Reporter, Evelyn Knight; Class Sponser, Roy E Maxwell. It was unanimously agreed that each member should pay a weekly dues of five cents.

It has been arranged that those girls who wish in the Sophomore class may take Domestic Science. Bessie Layman and Verba Haner are the only two who expect to carry this work.

The members of the Sophomore latin class are "overjoyed" to know that they will begin, in earnest the study of Caesar tomorrow. E K.

SENIOR:

The Senior class will have charge of the opening exercises next Monday morning.

The study of Civics seems to be as interesting to the girls as to the boys. This is probably due to the fact that women can vote, as well as the men. J. K.

"Look What He Got"

A farm hand wanted to borrow a lantern to go to see his best girl one dark night and the stingy old farmer said: "You don't need a lantern. When I was young I went courting in the dark." The hired man retorted; "Yes, and see what you got."

We will get in enough coal for everyone but will have to fill your orders from more than one car, in order to let your neighbor have coal to keep warm with.

Give your orders to Bert Jackson. He will take care of you and you will receive your full amount of order. He is going to keep you all warm, so work with him.

Another Close One

Harold Walts narrowly escaped an accident last Friday morning that would have meant death to him and destruction to his Ford Coupe when he backed off the track at the B. & O. crossing near the Grist Mill, just in time to let a fast east bound express train miss him.

Harold, who is employed at the mill, was going to work and was crossing the track at about his usual time. He says he was looking east for the west bound fast train that was due about that time and was not expecting the one from the west for it was several hours late. Just as the front wheels of his car crossed the first rail he turned his head and saw the train coming less than a block away. He hastily threw the machine in reverse and backed off just in time for the speeding train to pass.

Several men at the depot saw his peril and expected in a second that he would be hit, but Harold worked fast.

Sale Of Shorthorn Cattle

E. Case, residing 1½ mile southwest of St. Joe on the Ft. Wayne road, has billed his entire herd of twenty-two Shorthorn Cattle to sell at public auction on Wednesday, November 8.

He has made a special business of breeding Shorthorn cattle for a great many years and has now in his herd some of the finest bred stock in the country.

Mr. Case states that his reasons for selling are his increasing years and declining health and strength. Watch for his bill in next week's issue of this paper.

Mr. Wyatt is a progressive young stock man residing 3 miles west of Concord. He raised only the spotted Poland type of hogs and is offering a very fine herd of stock at this sale.

DWINDLING FORESTS ARE FORCING MUCH DECREASED USE OF LUMBER

The Exhaustion of Our Timber Supply Is Coming About Because We Have Failed to Use Our Timber-Growing Land.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

If the food consumed by each man, woman, and child were reduced by one-third, the pinch of hunger would soon be felt and the cry of famine undoubtedly raised.

Yet substitute the word "wood" for "food" and you have exactly what has happened in the use of lumber. The per capita consumption has dropped from 500 board feet in 1900 to 316 board feet in 1920, says the forest service, United States Department of Agriculture.

This decreasing use of a fundamental commodity, according to forest experts, is not a result of decreasing needs but a result of forest exhaustion. It is not being accomplished without economic hardship or without curtailment of industrial expansion. It is not a temporary condition that will automatically adjust itself, for even at this reduced rate of consumption we are still cutting our forests more than four times as fast as they grow. The situation proclaims, according to the forest service, that if we are to remain a nation of timber users, we must become a nation of timber growers.

Reached Highest Point in 1906.

In 1906, when American lumber production reached its highest point, the average per capita consumption of lumber in the United States was approximately 500 board feet. Since that time the per capita consumption has rapidly and consistently decreased until in 1920 the average citizen used approximately 316 board feet. This is a reduction of 37 per cent in 13 years, or nearly 3 per cent a year. Should this decrease continue at its present rate, by 1940 the downward sweep of consumption would approach zero. This, of course, will not happen. The average consumption will ultimately reach a fairly stable level, which will depend mainly upon the extent to which our devastated forests are made again productive.

The consumption of lumber is not evenly distributed. Previous studies indicated that the states of the Pacific Northwest, now the last great stronghold of big lumbering operations, had a much higher per capita consumption than those of other regions, but the present figures are the first to give information for all states upon the same basis. Naturally the greatest per capita consumption occurs where wood is plentiful and the population is relatively small. In Washington and Oregon the consumption appears to be between 900 and 1,000 board feet annually per person.

Next come California, Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming, where the rate of consumption is from 500 to 800 feet per person annually. In these states timber is relatively plentiful as compared with the density of the population, and a very considerable expansion has been taking place in the development of farms and other natural resources.

The group next lower in per capita consumption includes the Lake states, and sweeps southwesterly across the prairie states through Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona. In this group the annual consumption is between 300 and 500 feet, board measure.

Use Less Than 300 Feet.

Practically all the remaining states fall into a class in which the annual consumption is 200 to 300 feet. This group extends in a broad belt from Texas along the southern and eastern Atlantic coast to Cape Cod, Mass. It also includes North Dakota, Iowa, Utah, and Nevada.

The lowest consumption of all is in Rhode Island, the District of Columbia, South Carolina, and Georgia, in which the average consumption is rated between 100 and 200 feet per year. In the District of Columbia there is an extreme situation in density of population. No lumber is produced, there is little farming or manufacturing, and the entire population consists of urban dwellers in the city of Washington who live mainly in houses of brick and stone and require relatively little lumber. All the lumber used in the District of Columbia is imported from other states, just as it is in some of the non-timbered prairie states.

In general, the older and more densely settled states show the lowest average consumption. The states characterized by heavy agricultural operations come next, and the greatest use per individual is indicated in those states where there is still considerable timber and where the extension of home building is proceeding at a rapid rate, using the abundant material provided by the forests. The states are going through an evolutionary process, building first of lumber and later of more costly materials as the forests recede before fire and axe.

Seed Corn Tips

There should be a free circulation of air around the ears while they are drying.

Corn should not be dried in the direct sunlight.

Poorly dried corn will be much lower in germination.

Artificial heat or kiln drying quickly expels the excess moisture from the ears and prevents injury by freezing.

Kiln-dried seed corn has the greater vigor and vitality.

Do not overheat the corn while it is moist.

Partially dried corn should not be exposed to zero weather.

After drying, corn should be stored in a dry room which is free from rats and mice.—R. A. Moore, University of Wisconsin.

Whatever had happened, Hammond had evidently not been easily captured. His countenance was somewhat battered, and the one captor who wore a collar was bleeding copiously from a cut cheek. The three turned as Gramont's car drove up, and Hammond gave an ejaculation of relief.

"Here he is now—"

"Shut up!" snapped one of his armed captors in an ugly tone. "Hurry up, Chacherre—get a rope and tie this gink!"

Gramont leaped from the car and strode forward.

"What's been going on here?" he demanded, sharply. "Hammond—"

"I found a dead man over in them bushes," shot out Hammond, "and these guys jumped me before I seen 'em. They claim I done it—"

"I Found a Dead Man Over in Them Bushes," Shot Out Hammond.

"A dead man!" repeated Gramont, and looked at the three. "What do you mean?"

"Give him the spiel, Chacherre," growled one of them. Ben Chacherre stepped forward, his bold eyes fastened on those of Gramont with a look of defiance.

"The sheriff was here some time ago, looking for a stolen boat," he said, "and went off toward the Ledanois place. We were following, in order to help him search, when we came upon this man standing in the bushes, over the body of the sheriff. A knife was in his hand, and the sheriff had been stabbed to death. He drew a pistol and shot one of us—"

Gramont was staggered for a moment. "Wait!" he exclaimed. "Hammond, how much of this is true?"

"What I'm tellin' you, cap'n," answered Hammond, doggedly. "I found a man layin' there and was looking at him when these guys jumped me. I shot that fellow in the arm, all right, then they grabbed my gun and got me down. That's all."

The sheriff—murdered!

Into the mind of Gramont leaped that brief conversation which he had overheard between Ben Chacherre and the sheriff; the strange, unnatural silence which had concluded that broken-off conversation. He stared from Hammond to the others, speechless for the moment, yet with hot words rising impetuously in him.

Now he noticed that Chacherre and his two companions were watching him very intently, and were slightly circling out. He sensed an acquaintance among all these men. He saw that the wounded man had finished his bandaging, and was now holding his unwounded hand in his pocket, bulkily, menacingly.

Danger flashed upon Gramont—flashed upon him vividly and with startling clearness. He realized that anything was possible in this isolated spot—this spot where murder had so lately been consummated! He checked on his very lips what he had been about to blurt forth; at this instant, Hammond voiced the thought in his mind.

"It's a frame-up!" said the chauffeur angrily.

"That's [illegible] isn't it?" Chacherre flung the words in a sneer, but [illegible] a covert [illegible] at Gramont. "[illegible] fellow [illegible] we [illegible] Houma [illegible]" was all Gramont wanted to know—that the man was lying. "We were trailin' along after him when he stepped into the bushes. This man of yours was standing over him with a knife—"

[illegible]

"I was, too, when they found me—I was cuttin' me a fishpole," said Hammond, sulkily. He was plainly beginning to be impressed and alarmed by the evidence against him. Gramont only nodded.

"No one saw the actual murder, then?"

"No need for it," said Chacherre, brazenly. "When we found him that way! Eh?"

"I suppose not," answered Gramont, his eyes fastened thoughtfully on Hammond. The latter caught the look, let his jaw fall in astonishment, then flushed and compressed his lips—and waited. Gramont glanced at Chacherre, and launched a chance shaft.

"You're Ben Chacherre, aren't you? Do you work for Mr. Fell?"

The chance shot scored. "Yes," said Chacherre, his eyes narrowing.

"What are you doing here, then?"

For an instant Chacherre was off guard. He did not know how much—or little—Gramont knew; but he did know that Gramont was aware who had taken the loot of the Midnight Masquer from the luggage compartment of the car. This knowledge, very naturally, threw him back on the defense of which he was most sure.

"I came on an errand for my master," he said, and with those words gave the game into Gramont's hands.

There was a moment of silence. Gramont stood apparently in musing thought, conscious that every eye was fastened upon him, and that one false move would now spell disaster. He gave no sign of the tremendous shock that Chacherre's words had just given him; when he spoke, it was quietly and coolly:

"Then your master is evidently associated with Memphis Izzy Gumberts, who owns this place here. Is that right?"

Both Hammond and Chacherre's two friends started at this.

"I don't know anything about that," returned Chacherre, with a shrug which did not entirely conceal his uneasiness. "I know that we've got a murderer here, and that we'll have to dispose of him. Do you object?"

"Of course not," said Gramont, calmly. "Step aside and give me a moment in private with Hammond. Then by all means take him in to Houma. I'd suggest that you tie him up, or make use of handcuffs if the sheriff brought any along. Then you'd better take in the body of the sheriff also. Hammond, a word with you!"

This totally unexpected acquiescence on the part of Gramont seemed to stun Chacherre into inaction. He half moved, as though uncertain whether to bar Gramont from the prisoner, then he stepped aside as Gramont advanced. A gesture to his two companions prevented them from interfering.

"Keep 'em covered, though," he said, shifting his own rifle slightly and watching with a scowl of suspicion.

Gramont ignored him and went up to Hammond, with a look of warning.

"You'll have to submit to this, old man," he said, in a tone that the others could not overhear. "Don't dream that I'm deserting you; but I want a good look at this place if all three of them go away. They must not suspect—"

"Cap'n, look out!" broke in Hammond, urgently. "This here is a gang—the whole thing is a frame-up on me!"

"I know it—I was present when the sheriff was murdered; but keep quiet. I'll come to Houma later tonight and see you." He turned away with a shrug, as though Hammond had denied him some favor, and lifted his voice. "Chacherre! How are you to take this man into town? How did you get here? Will you need to use my car?"

"No." The Creole jerked his head toward the barn. "I came in Mr. Fell's car—it's got a sprung axle and is laid up. We'll take him back in another one."

"Very well." Gramont [illegible] and glanced around. "This is a terrible blow, men. I never dreamed that Hammond was a murderer or could be one. You can't [illegible] of any motive for the crime?"

They [illegible] their heads [illegible]

[illegible]

that, when he lay there by the rivulet, he had actually heard the last words uttered by the sheriff; that Chacherre had committed the murder in that moment—a noiseless, deadly stab! That Hammond could or would have done it he knew was absurd.

They found the murdered man lying among the bushes. He had been stabbed under the fifth rib—the knife had gone direct to the heart. Chacherre announced that he had Hammond's knife as evidence and Gramont merely nodded his head.

Lifting the body between them, they bore it back to the barn.

"Now," said Gramont, quickly, "I'm off for Houma—if I don't miss my road! You men will be right along?"

"In a jiffy," said Chacherre promptly.

Gramont climbed into his car and drove away. He had no fear of anything happening to Hammond; the evidence against the latter was damning, and with three men to swear him into a hangman's noose, they would bring him to jail safe enough.

"A clever devil, that Chacherre!" he thought, grimly. "We're up against a gang, beyond any doubt. Now, if they don't suspect me—"

He turned in at the Ledanois gate, knowing himself to be beyond sight or hearing of the Gumberts place. He drove the car away from the house, and into the thick of the densest bush-growth that he could find, where it was well concealed from sight. Then, on foot, he made his way along the bank of the bayou until he had come to the rivulet where oil showed.

Here he paused, concealing himself and gaining a place where he could get a view of the Gumberts land. He saw Chacherre and Hammond there beside the body of the sheriff; the other two men were swinging open the barn door. They disappeared inside, and a moment later Gramont heard the whirr of an engine starting. A car backed into the yard and halted.

The three men lifted the body of the sheriff into the tonneau. Chacherre took the wheel, Hammond being bundled in beside him. The other two men climbed in beside the body, rifles in hand. Chacherre started the car toward the road.

"All fine!" thought Gramont with a thrill of exultation. "They've cleared out and left the place to me—and I want a look at that place."

Suddenly, as he stood there, he remembered the slight "plump" that he had heard during that interminable silence which had followed the conversation between the sheriff and Ben Chacherre. It was a sound as though something had fallen near him in the soggy ground.

The remembrance startled him strangely. He visualized an excited murderer standing beside his victim, knife in hand; he visualized the abhorrence which must have seized the man for a moment—the abhorrence which must have caused him to do something in that moment which in a cooler time he would not have done.

A Low Exclamation of Satisfaction Broke From Him as He Found What He Sought.

Gramont turned toward the little marshy spot where he had lain listening. He bent down, searching the wet ground, heedless that the water soaked into his knees. And, after a minute, a low exclamation of satisfaction broke from him as he found what he sought.

INDIANA BREVITIES

Lafayette.—Mrs. Mindwell Crampton Wilson, of Delphi, was elected regent of the Indiana D. A. R. at the annual conference at Lafayette. Directors elected are Miss Julia Landers of Indianapolis and Mrs. Charles Q. Erisman of Lafayette, and Mrs. Charles Hartley of New Albany. Mrs. Henry Beck of Indianapolis was indorsed for vice president general and the conference indorsed the candidacy of Mrs. S. E. Perkins of Indianapous as corresponding secretary general. Mrs. E. H. Darrach of Indianapolis presented the motion. The conference also approved a resolution in favor of a Paul Dresser memorial at Terre Haute instead of changing the name of the Tecumseh Trail park to Paul Dresser park.

English.—Preparations are being made for a farmers' short course to be held at Marengo December 7 and 8. Purdue university, through Horace Copeland, county agricultural agent, is directing the arrangements and a committee of Marengo business men has charge of the local plans. The program provides for instruction in dairying, poultry raising and home management. One evening is to be devoted to entertainment when a program of readings and music will be given.

Indianapolis.—The total 1922 registration in the 92 counties in Indiana, according to figures compiled by the state board of election commissioners, and unofficially tabulated, is 1,413,257, compared to 1,446,401 in 1920. The fact that the registration for a purely off-year state election comes within 33,244 of that obtained for a presidential campaign is looked on as remarkable by political leaders.

Evansville.—John C. Bolen, age eight; Louis Hertel, age eleven, and Henry Cradford, age eleven, were arrested and confessed, the police say, to breaking into an implement and hardware store and a candy store and stealing pistols, cartridges, a box of crackers, candy and cigarettes. The boys told the police that they had intended to go camping in Kentucky and that they wished to lay in liberal supplies.

Anderson.—W. F. Clawson, age sixty-four, charged with selling property under mortage in Huntington county, was arrested here and was delivered to W. E. Payne, sheriff of Huntington county. It is said that the charge relates to a growing crop on land in which Clawson was interested. He and his wife were preparing to leave for Eugenia, Ore., when he was arrested. He had bought tickets and his baggage was checked for the trip.

Indianapolis.—The will of Delavan Smith, publisher of the Indianapolis News, was admitted to probate in Waukegan, Ill. The will disposes of nearly $2,000,000, most of which goes to Lake Forest, Indianapolis and Indiana charitable institutions. All the employees of the Indianapolis News were remembered in bequests ranging from a few hundred dollars to $10,000.

Wabash.—W. H. Tuttle of Petroleum, Wells county, was re-elected a director of the Indiana Farmers' Federation from the Fourth district at the meeting here. I. L. Needler of Grant county was re-elected secretary. Delegates voted to instruct the district director to name a committee to select a live stock director.

Shelbyville.—Dorsey Jones, president of the scout council in Shelbyville, has appointed a committee of six men to ascertain from citizens whether they desire to maintain a boy scout organization. The organization will need financial support if it is continued.

Gary.—Lack of men is holding down the output of the steel mills here. The mills are now operating at 80 per cent of capacity, while subsidiary plants are nearing the 85 per cent mark and will soon pass that figure. The Gary plants would employ more than 2,000 additional men if they could be obtained, an official said.

Marion.—R. J. Duke, boys' secretary of the Indiana Y. M. C. A., was here making arrangements for the state boys' conference, to be held in Marion on December 1, 2 and 3. The main speakers of the conference will be E. C. Willcuts of Sioux City, Ia.; C. C. Robinson, member of the men's international committee, and Dr. John Brown, Jr.

Winchester.—Hans Rudolph Frederickson, a native of Finland, has filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States. He came to this country with former Gov. and Mrs. James P. Goodrich and Miss Marie Moorman when they returned from Europe recently.

Elwood.—Following a visit of a post office inspector changes were made in Rural Routes 2, 3 and 4 of the local office, thereby giving service to 16 more patrons in the country northwest of the city. Each carrier travels about one additional mile.

Sullivan.—Officers have been elected and the dates chosen for the [illegible] will be held at Sullivan [illegible] 1923. [illegible]

[illegible]

Indianapolis.—Additional school legislation is not needed in Indiana at this time, according to a statement made public by the legislative committee of the Indiana State Teachers' association following a meeting here. It was said that the new educational laws passed by the last session of the legislature are proving beneficial for the school interests of the state, but that additional legislation should not be enacted now. The committee urged that the report of the educational survey commission, which will probably be made public next month, be received with an open mind by the public. The committee elected Miss Florence Case of Marion, chairman, and Miss Kathryne Flanigan of Logansport, secretary.

Franklin.—Special services were held at the Indiana Masonic home by the Masonic lodges from Brazil, Rushville and Mays. A special train from Brazil brought over 300 members, while 100 members from Phoenix lodge of Rushville and 50 from Raleigh lodge of Mays attended the exercises. The address was given by J. M. Walker of Rushville, and a quartette from that lodge sang. The Masonic Glee club of Brazil gave several numbers. A chalk talk was given by George James of Brazil and Harry Schackelford of Brazil entertained with singing and whistling. The meeting marked the close of visiting lodges at the home this fall.

Frankfort.—Playing "sick lady and doctor" and using strychnine tablets for medicine almost cost the lives of two small children at Kilmore. Five children were in the party and two of them swallowed enough poison to kill several persons, but the timely intervention of the mother of one of the children saved their lives. The children who took the poison were Irene, age three, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Keck, and Sarabelle, age five, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Cloyd Thompson.

Columbus.—The apple crop this season is the largest in the history of Bartholomew county, according to growers. Trees in every orchard in the county are loaded. In the western part of the county, where apples form the principal crop, thousands of bushels have been sorted and sent to local markets and to other cities. Hundreds of Columbus residents go to the orchards in their automobiles and buy the fruit.

Noblesville.—The Farmers' Federation of Hamilton county, at its annual meeting held in this city, elected the following officers and directors: A. H. Myers, president; E. K. Klepfer, vice president; Jesse Johnson, secretary; Frances Mussleman, treasurer, and Garrick Mallery, James Corbin, Neal McKinstray, Calvin Hiatt and Alfred Kinzer, directors.

Loogootte.—The annual stock and produce show was held in this city October 12, 13 and 14, at which time $1,000 were paid in premiums. The pig club and promotion show, given under the auspices of the various swine breeders' associations, and the sow and litter club show, financed by the White River bank, were held at the same time.

Noblesville.—The annual reunion in Hamilton county of the soldiers of all American wars was held in Noblesville. Of the 3,000 men who enlisted in the service from this county in the Civil, Spanish-American and World wars, only thirty-two were present at the meeting, the smallest attendance since the association was formed several years ago.

Columbus.—J. P. Kirkpatrick, a farmer, has been selected manager of the Bartholomew County Shipping association at Columbus. He will have charge of the co-operative buying for the members of the Bartholomew county farm bureau and will supervise shipping of live stock.

Crown Point.—Jakes A. Saults, "king of the Gary underworld," and known as "the immune," was found guilty of conducting a disorderly house, selling liquor and keeping gambling devices, by a jury in the Lake county Circuit court here. He was sentenced to six months' imprisonment at the state penal farm.

Muncie.—Because, as she sets forth in her complaint, a car window dropped on her arm and seriously injured it, Mrs. Martha S. Medaris has filed suit against the Indiana Union Traction company for $3,000 as damages. She says that the accident was due to the carelessness of traction company employees.

Rushville.—Salvation Army tag day ended the special appeal made at Rushville by the army to supply winter relief needs. Twenty-five high school girls sold tags, following a house to house canvass by army officers. Approximately $900 was raised.

Hartford City.—Four freight cars on the Pennsylvania tracks west of this city were wrecked when a rail gave way Friday and the cars left the track. They were loaded with coal. The tracks were blocked for five hours.

She Wished to Know.

"Ps-s-st!" hissed the new waitress, who was addicted to the movie habit. "Wise me up, will yeh? I never worked in a caf-fay before."

"Whattaya want to know?" returned Heloise, the head waitress.

"Why, them three guys over there ordered lemon pie. D'ye slap 'em in the face with it or slide it to 'em on plates?"—Kansas City Star.

NOTHING NORMAL ABOUT HER

Critic Asserts Author Is All Wrong in His Description of Heroine of His Tale.

Harold G. Armstrong, the author of "For Richer, for Poorer," apparently has no desire to enroll himself in the younger generation. At any rate his herine is flamboyantly an old-fashioned girl. On page 158 we read, "All at once Marion let down her hair." More than that, Kenneth Gramling, the hero, was thrilled thereby. "It was a symbol. They kissed. Deep-encysted inhibitions vanished. They were normal people, after all."

Marion did not seem so to us. We do not think she should be allowed to qualify. If she had been a normal heroine of today, it would have been the hair which had vanished and the inhibitions which were let down.—Heywood Broun in the New York World.

Finding Who's Who.

Recently I attended a convention in an eastern city. The evening the convention closed we were entertained at a dance.

As I was standing near an open door to cool off, two local men came up to talk to me.

Suddenly I realized I had that dance engaged and said, "Jove, I nearly forgot I had this dance engaged! I've got to leave. I made one mistake tonight, forgetting a dance, but the woman weighed over two hundred pounds, so I didn't weep about it, believe me!"

"Yes," calmly remarked one of the men. "My wife mentioned you had cut a dance with her."—Chicago Tribune.

WAS A FACT ACCOMPLISHED

Married Men Will Be at No Loss to Understand That Further Argument Was Useless.

A couple was seated on the top of a Fifth avenue bus and their words reached everyone around them. He ventured a timid suggestion that they get off at Forty-seventh street. She had decided upon a street farther south and said so with finality. An argument followed, if a conversation can be called an argument in which one side has so much the best of it. The people listening in from nearby seats were naturally interested in the outcome.

As the bus slowed down for the Forty-second street crossing the woman remained seated, and the man renewed his argument. It was a word in the final veto, however, which especially attracted the audience. Every married man present understood.

"There is no use talking," the woman declared with finality. "I have made up our minds."—New York Times.

King Takes No Chances.

King Alfonso of Spain has given not a few evidences of being a fairly sensible monarch. He furnished the latest at Deauville, where he has been a regular watcher of the reckless gambling in the baccarat rooms without ever joining in the play. He explained his abstention by saying: "I am not rich enough to play baccarat." Whether his plea of comparative poverty was well grounded or not, it is likely that, as he looks about Europe and notes the thrones that are without the kings who once sat on them, his bump of caution is developed to a point where he realizes the dangers that beset a king who is too ready to take a chance.—Christian Science Monitor.

HYMN COVERED HIS RETREAT

Probably Young Clergyman Feared He Would Get Into Yet Deeper Water If He Kept On.

In Georgia they tell of a young clergyman, newly settled over a large parish, who had occasional fits of embarrassment when standing before his congregation.

One Sunday, after reading a notice of a woman's missionary meeting to be held in the chapel a few days later, he endeavored to add a special appeal of his own for a large attendance.

After stating that it was to be a meeting of great interest and importance, he said: "We, the women of this congregation—"

With a flushed countenance he stopped and retraced his steps.

"We, who are the women of this congregation," he began.

This was no better, and he beat a blushing retreat by saying: "Let us sing the four hundred and first hymn."—Philadelphia Ledger.

His Lack.

"Looky yur, Gap!" indignantly cried Mrs. Johnson. "I've been trying to get a sensible answer out of you for right smart of a while, and all you say is 'Hush?' What's the matter with you, anyhow? Hain't you got no sense?"

"Not a—p'tu!—durn bit!" replied Gap Johnson of Rumpus Ridge. "I've been trying for three, four hours to figger out a right good name for that there new dog of mine, and kain't think of a thing."—Kansas City Star.

Bad Day for Johnny.

A Topeka doctor called to attend a two-year-old boy who had fallen from a second-story window found no injuries and gave the little chap a penny to quit crying. Just as the doctor reached home the telephone bell rang violently. It was the child's mother. "Hurry back, doctor, Johnny has swallowed the penny," she exclaimed. And Johnny survived even that.—Capper's Weekly.

LLOYD GEORGE AND MINISTRY ARE OUT

Premier of Great Britain and His Cabinet Resign.

DEBACLE FORCED BY TORIES

Bonar Law Takes Helm of Ship of State—Resolution Passed Calling for Conservative Autonomy at Next Election.

London, Oct. 20.—The resignation of Prime Minister David Lloyd George, which carried with it the resignations of the entire coalition cabinet, was accepted by King George. Andrew Bonar Law, leader of the conservative party, which forced an end to the coalition government, accepted King George's proposal to form a new government.

Tories in Command.

The cabinet debacle was precipitated by a meeting of tories. Austen Chamberlain, conservative leader in the house of commons, was repudiated as to his support of Lloyd George, and a resolution was passed declaring for conservative autonomy at the next election.

Interpreted, this was a call for Chamberlain's resignation, implying that of Lloyd George and the members of his cabinet. This action took place in the morning. At 6:08 at night the resignation of Lloyd George formally was announced.

Other Unionists Resign.

It is understood that several of the unionist junior members immediately after the unionist meeting tendered their resignations. Included among these are Stanley Baldwin, president of the board of trade; Viscount Peel, secretary of state for India; Sir Arthur Griffith-Boscowen, minister of agriculture and fisheries; Lieut.-Col. L. C. M. S. Amery, parliamentary and financial secretary to the admiralty; Sir Philip Lloyd Greame, minister of overseas trade; Sir John Baird, undersecretary of state for the home office, and Colonel Leslie Wilson, joint parliamentary secretary of the treasury, and chief unionist whip. Capt. H. D. King, another of the unionist whips, and Colonel Albert Buckley, assistant unionist whip, also resigned.

THE UNIVERSAL CAR

Prices Cut

50 Per Cent Lower Than In 1920

According to a statement just issued by Edsel B. Ford, president of the Ford Motor Company, Detroit, a general reduction of $50.00 a car has been made in the prices of Ford Model T Cars and the Ford 1-Ton Truck, effective October 17.

"The revision in prices," said Mr. Ford, "is the result of the increased volume of business which our company has enjoyed during the present year, and also, to the fact that we now own and operate many of our own sources of raw material, which enables us to continue increasing the quality of our product and at the same time keep the price so low that Ford cars are in reach of everybody.

"Our production for 1922 is already in excess of a million, which has been an important factor in bringing down costs. Our present daily output is averaging better than 5,000 cars and trucks, which means a complete Ford car or truck every 5½ seconds of each 8 hour working day. It is in anticipation of this continued demand that price abjustments are again being made in order keep in effect the policy of selling Ford products at the lowest price consistent with quality.

"Quality, as usual, will continue to be prime consideration in the building of Ford Cars As our business has increased we have constantly insreased our equipment and manufacturing facilities, so that this price reduction merely reflects the progressive methods which come as a result of increased volume.

"This reduction, which is the sixth since March 1920, brings the price of the Ford Touring Car from $575, the price in effect early in 1920, to the present extremely low level of $298, which is nearly 50 per cent less. Corresponding reductions have made on all other types."

The New Prices By Types, F. O. B. Detroit, are as follows:

American Farm Bureau

Interior of Co-operative Peach Shipping Plant, Gypsum, Ohio.

Fruit growers of Ohio, joined together in a state-wide organization, marketed apples and peaches co-operatively on an extensive scale this year. The organization, the Ohio Fruit Growers' Co-operative association, adopted the "Buckeye" brand as their sales standard. Both apples and peaches went to market under this brand.

In the Catawba island district of northern Ohio a local marketing unit sent out more than 20,000 bushels of peaches. Shipments were made as far south as Alabama, and entered the markets of a large number of eastern cities. The fruit was packed and graded and the co-operative organizations stand back of their standards of quality. They are also receiving federal certification.

At the same time that peaches were moving from the northern district of the state, apples were being shipped by two or three locals in southern Ohio. Two large mechanical graders were used in this section, and the apples sold according to quality, with the producer getting the full returns minus the expenses of handling. They were handled in the same manner as the peaches and under the same brand name.

START PORK EATING SCHEME IN MISSOURI

Farm Bureau in Livingston County Inaugurates Plan to Encourage Consumption.

An interesting and effective method of increasing the consumption of meat locally is outlined by D. B. Forrester, county agent in Livingston county, Missouri.

"Livingston county tried out something last year which I believe should be commended to every county in the United States. The farm bureau, through the live stock shippers' association, established a retail meat market to deliver large pieces, such as hams, sides and shoulders of pork to consumers at a low price. The farm bureau loaned a revolving fund of $200. They hired a farmer living north of town to kill hogs for $1 each, and make the delivery at the same price. If no hogs were killed and delivered there was no overhead expense. Seven cents per hundredweight was paid to the manager of the Chillicothe Shipping association to locate and keep these hogs supplied to the butcher. This pork was furnished to the consumers at from one-half to two-thirds of the price it was being sold at local butcher shops in the same-sized pieces. However, after this market was established the local butchers came down to the same price. An advertisement giving the price of meats and phone number was put in three local papers and run for the four winter months. Killing and delivering was three times per week, [illegible]

"The Farm Bureau Live Stock [illegible]

[illegible] started this market, and made the threat that he would break the concern. We sent him word it was broke to start with, and there was no chance for loss in the operation. After the first month of operation the local butcher got it out of his head that his business was going to be hurt, and some of the more fair-minded men could see that the fact that meat was being advertised all the time really increased their sales. We asked the county agents of two adjoining counties which had towns about the size of Chillicothe, to make an investigation to ascertain whether their butchers sold more meat than in previous years. From all information obtainable both the county agents reported less sales in the winter of 1921 and 1922 than in previous years. Our butchers increased their sales.

IMPROVED ROADS

PAINT HELPS STEEL BRIDGES

Life of Many Structures Shortened by Infrequent and Improper Treatment.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The life of many steel highway bridges is materially shortened because of infrequent and improper painting, says the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture. Each year a considerable amount of money is spent for the replacement of rusted bridge members that would have remained sound if they had been kept painted; and more serious than the waste of money is the danger to the public due to the weakening of some hidden part which may cause the collapse of the whole bridge.

A Dangerous Bridge—This Rusting Could Have Been Prevented by Painting.

Officials of the bureau urge that all steel bridges be inspected at least once each year and repainted at the first sign of rusting. Normally repainting is required at periods of from two to five years, depending on the climate. A suitable paint should be used, and if there is uncertainty about any point, information should be requested from the state highway department.

It is a mistake to repaint without properly cleaning the metal of all dirt, rust, loose paint, and blisters. Usually the places hardest to reach are the ones that should receive the most attention.

PROBLEMS IN ROAD BUILDING

Officials of State Organizations and Bureau of Public Roads Discuss Questions.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The committee on tests of the American Society of State Highway Officials met with the officials of the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture, in Washington, June 26 and 27, to consider standardization of specifications and tests for road materials. The purpose of this meeting of representatives from all sections of the country was not so much to lay down rigid rules as to harmonize the general practice. Standardization taking into account local conditions is being brought about by a series of meetings between officials from groups of states and engineers of the bureau.

The present activity of highway officials along this line is most encouraging for road building. A few years ago the general tendency was toward individuality in each state, without much opportunity for exchange of ideas and knowledge. Today the tendency is in the other direction, and a better solution should be reached when the problems are discussed at meetings of the best highway engineering talent of the country.

LESSON FOR OCTOBER 29

MESSIAH'S MINISTRY (WORLD'S TEMPERANCE SUNDAY)

LESSON TEXT—Isa. 61:1-9.

GOLDEN TEXT—Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people.—Prov. 14:34.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Matt. 7:15-20; Rom. 14:13.

PRIMARY TOPIC—How Four Boys Became Healthy and Happy.—Dan. 1:3-20.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Destroying the World's Enemy.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Next Step in the Prohibition Campaign.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Progress of Prohibition Throughout the World.

The lesson committee has gratuitously named this lesson "World-wide Prohibition." Neither the text nor the context, directly or implied, says anything about prohibition as we understand the use of the word. However, when Messiah shall reign upon the earth the rum traffic with all other iniquitous practices will be abolished.

I. Messiah's Commission (v. 1).

He was appointed by the Lord. God's plan for the world is a time of peace and blessing.

II. Messiah's Program (vv. 1, 2).

Messiah's program is twofold: to "proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God." The careful reading of Luke 4:18-21 will show that Jesus suspended reading of this passage at the comma, in Isaiah 61:2. His first coming opened up the day of "grace and the acceptable year of the Lord," and His second coming will usher in "the day of vengeance of our God." (II Thess. 1:7-10; cf. Mal. 3:1-3).

1. Proclaiming the Acceptable Year of the Lord (vv. 1, 2). In His ministry of grace He preached (1) "good tidings to the meek." "Meek" here means not only a grace, but a condition, that is, those in poverty and affliction. (2) "Bind up the broken-hearted." "Bind up" signifies healing. (3) "Liberty to the captives." The figure of deliverance from the Babylonian captivity is used to describe deliverance from sin and death (Heb. 2:15). (4) "Opening of the prison to them that are bound." Messiah's work was to give deliverance to those who were enslaved by the consequences of their sins. (5) "The acceptable year of the Lord." This means a space of time in which God would accept all who repent of their sins and come to Him.

2. Proclaiming the day of vengeance of God (v. 2). While the day of mercy is lengthened out, the time of judgment will surely come. The day of vengeance will break upon the world when the Lord shall be revealed from heaven (II Thess. 1:7-10). The period of mercy is called "year," while the period of vengeance is called "day," showing that the period of mercy is much longer than the period of wrath.

III. The Blessings of Messiah's Kingdom (vv. 3-9).

1. "Comfort all that mourn" (v. 2). The day of vengeance will bring sorrow to many, but they shall be comforted when they shall see the King on the throne.

2. "Give unto them beauty for ashes" (v. 3). This peculiarly applies to Israel.

3. "Oil of Joy for Mourning" (v. 3). Israel has been mourning for centuries. When the Messiah shall reign as King they shall be glad.

4. "Garment of Praise for the Spirit of Heaviness" (v. 3). Instead of wearing the symbol of the burden of sin they shall be clothed so as to indicate their joyfulness.

5. "Called Trees of Righteousness" (v. 3). These trees represent Israel as planted by God and bearing fruit, not as reeds bowed down with sorrow.

6. "They Shall Build the Old Wastes" (v. 4). Israel shall return to their own land and shall rebuild the city of Jerusalem and the cities of Judah which [illegible]

Pills and salts give temporary relief from constipation only at the expense of permanent injury, says an eminent medical authority.

Science has found a newer, better way—a means as simple as Nature itself.

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft and moving. But when constipation exists this natural lubricant is not sufficient. Medical authorities have found that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. THE KING OF BOYVILLE :-:

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

BOYS who are born in a small town are born free and equal. In the big city it may be different; there are doubtless good little boys who disdain bad little boys, and poor little boys who are never to be noticed under any circumstances. But in a small town, every boy, good or bad, rich or poor, stands among boys on his own merits. The son of the banker who owns a turning-pole in the back yard, does homage to the baker's boy who can sit on the bar and drop and catch by his legs; while the good little boy who is kept in wide collars and cuffs by a mistaken mother, gazes through the white paling of his father's fence at the troupe headed for the swimming hole, and pays all the reverence which his dwarfed nature can muster to the sign of the two fingers. In the social order of boys who live in country towns, a boy is measured by what he can do, and not by what his father is. And so, Winfield Hancock Pennington, whose boy name was Piggy Pennington, was the King of Boyville. For Piggy could walk on his hands, curling one foot gracefully over his back, and pointing the other straight in the air; he could hang by his heels on a flying trapeze; he could chin a pole so many times that no one could count the number; he could turn a somersault in the air from the level ground, both backwards and forwards, he could "tread" water and "lay" his hair; he could hit any marble in any ring from "taws" and "knucks down,"—and better than all, he could cut his initials in the ice on skates, and whirl around and around so many times that he looked like an animated shadow, when he would dart away up the stream, his red "comfort" flapping behind him like a laugh of defiance. In the story books such a boy would be the son of a widowed mother, and turn out very good or very bad, but Piggy was not a story book boy, and his father kept a grocery store, from which Piggy used to steal so many dates that the boys said his father must have cut up the almanac to supply him. As he never gave the goodies to the other boys, but kept them for his own use, his name of "Piggy" was his by all the rights of Boyville.

There was one thing Piggy Pennington could not do, and it was the one of all things which he most wished he could do; he could not under any circumstances say three consecutive and coherent words to any girl under fifteen and over nine. Even after school Piggy could not join the select coterie of boys who followed the girls down through town to the postoffice. He could not tease the girls about absent boys at such times and make up rhymes like:

"First the cat and then her tail; Jimmy Sears and Maggie Hale,"

and then shout them out for the crowd to hear. Instead of joining this courtly troupe Piggy Pennington went off with the boys who really didn't care for such things, and fought, or played "tracks up," or wrestled his way leisurely home in time to get in his "night wood." But his heart was not in these pastimes; it was with a red shawl of a peculiar shade, that was wending its way to the post office and back to a home in one of the few two-story houses in the little town. Time and again had Piggy tried to make some sign to let his feelings be known, but every time he had failed. Lying in wait for her at corners, and suddenly breaking upon her with a glory of backward and forward somersaults did not convey the state of his heart. So only one heart beat with but one single thought, and the other took motto candy and valentines and red apples and picture cards and other tokens of esteem from other boys, and beat on with any number of thoughts, entirely immaterial to the uses of this narrative. But Piggy Pennington did not take to the enchantment of corn silk cigarettes and rattan and grapevine cigars; he tried to sing, and wailed dismal ballads about the "Gypsy's Warning," and "The Child in the Grave With Its Mother," and "She's a Daisy, She's a Darling, She's a Dumpling, She's a Lamb," whenever he was in hearing distance of his heart's desire, in the hope of conveying to her some hint of the state of his affections; but it was useless. Even when he tried to whistle plaintively as he passed her house in the gloaming, his notes brought forth no responsive echo.

One morning in the late spring, he spent half an hour before breakfast among his mother's roses, which were just in first bloom. He had taken out there all the wire from an old broom, and all his kite string. His mother had to call three times before he would leave his work. The youngster was the first to leave the table, and by eight o'clock he was at his task again. Before the first school bell had rung, Piggy Pennington was bound for the school house with a strange looking parcel under his arm. He tried to put his coat over it, but it stuck out and the newspaper that was wrapped around it bulged into so many corners, that it looked like a home-tied bundle of laundry.

"What you got?" asked the freckle-faced boy, and was [illegible] at Piggy's feet [illegible] the "[illegible]" on the [illegible].

But Piggy Pennington was the king of Boyville, and he had a right to look straight ahead of him, as if he did not hear the question, and say:

"Lookie here, Mealy, I wish you would go and tell Abe I want him to hurry up, for I want to see him."

"Abe" was Piggy's nearest friend. His other name was Carpenter. Piggy only wished to be rid of the freckle-faced boy. But the freckle-faced boy was not used to royalty and its ways, so he pushed his inquiry.

"Say, Piggy, have you got your red ball-pants in that bundle?"

There was no reply. They had gone a block when the freckle-faced boy could stand it no longer and said:

"Say, Piggy, you needn't be so smart about your old bundle; now honest, Piggy, what have you got in that bundle?"

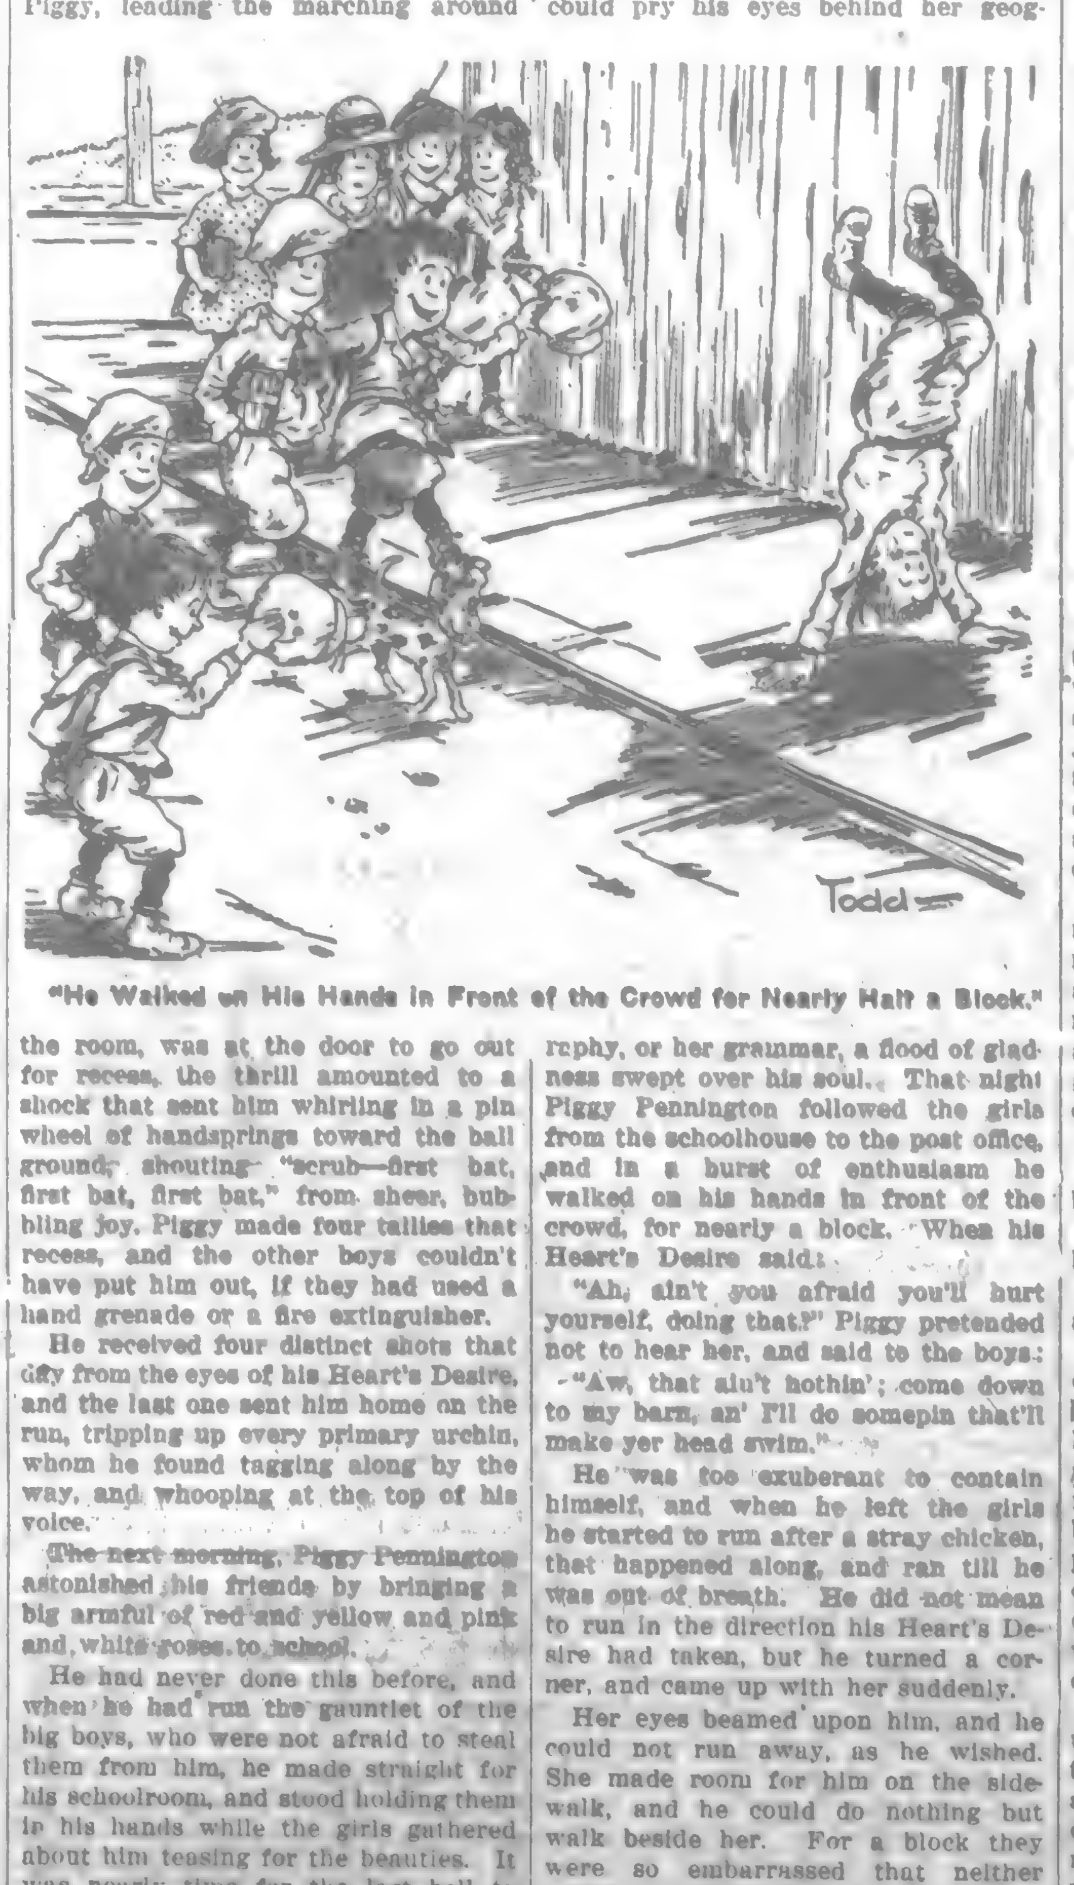
"Aw—soft soap, take a bite—good fer yer appetite," said the king, as he faced about and drew up his left cheek and lower eye-lid pugnaciously. The freckle-faced boy saw he would have to fight if he stayed, so he turned to go, and said, as though nothing had happened, "Where do you suppose old Abe is, anyhow?"

Just before school was called Piggy Pennington was playing "scrub" with all his might, and a little girl—his Heart's Desire—was taking out of her desk a wreath of roses, tied to a shaky wire frame. There was a crowd of girls around her admiring it, and speculating about the possible author of the gift; but to these she did not show the patent medicine card, on which was scrawled, over the druggist's advertisement:

"Yours truly, W. H. P."

When the last bell rang, Piggy Pennington was the last boy in, and he did not look toward the desk where he had put the flowers, until after the singing.

Then he stole a sidewise glance that way, and his Heart's Desire was deep in her geography. It was an age before she filed past him with the "B" class in geography, and took a seat directly in front of him, where he could look at her all the time, unobserved by her. Once she squirmed in her place and looked toward him, but Piggy Pennington was head over heels in the "Iser rolling rapidly." When their eyes did at last meet, just as Piggy, leading the marching around the room, was at the door to go out for recess, the thrill amounted to a shock that sent him whirling in a pin wheel of handsprings toward the ball ground, shouting "scrub—first bat, first bat, first bat," from sheer, bubbling joy. Piggy made four tallies that recess, and the other boys couldn't have put him out, if they had used a hand grenade or a fire extinguisher.



"He Walked on His Hands in Front of the Crowd for Nearly Half a Block."

He received four distinct shots that day from the eyes of his Heart's Desire, and the last one sent him home on the run, tripping up every primary urchin, whom he found tagging along by the way, and whooping at the top of his voice.

The next morning, Piggy Pennington astonished his friends by bringing a big armful of red and yellow and pink and white roses to school.

He had never done this before, and when he had run the gauntlet of the big boys, who were not afraid to steal them from him, he made straight for his schoolroom, and stood holding them in his hands while the girls gathered about him teasing for the beauties. It was nearly time for the last bell to ring, and Piggy knew that his Heart's Desire would be in the room by the time he got there. He was not mistaken. But Heart's Desire did not clamor with the other girls for one of the roses. Piggy stood off their pleadings as long as he could with "Naw," "Why naw, of course I won't," "Naw, what I want to give you one for," and "Go away from here I tell you," and still Heart's Desire did not ask for her flowers. There were but a few moments left before school would be called to order, and in desperation Piggy gave one rose away. It was not a very pretty rose, but he hoped she would see that the others were to be given away, and ask for one. But she —his Heart's Desire—stood near a window, talking to the freckle-faced boy. Then Piggy gave away one rose after another. As the last bell began to ring he gave them to the [illegible] as the girls were all [illegible]. And still she came not. There was one rose left, the most beautiful of all. [illegible]

a dark day. When a new boy, who didn't belong to the school, came up at recess to play, Piggy shuffled over to him and asked gruffly:

"What's your name?"

"Puddin' 'n' tame, ast me agin an' I'll tell you the same," said the new boy, and then there was a fight. It didn't soothe Piggy's feelings one bit that he whipped the new boy, for the new boy was smaller than Piggy. And he dared not turn his flushed face toward's his Heart's Desire. It was almost four o'clock when Piggy Pennington walked to the master's desk to get him to work out a problem, and as he passed the desk of Heart's Desire he dropped a note in her lap. It read:

"Are you mad?"

But he dared not look for the answer, as they marched out that night, so he contented himself with punching the boy ahead of him with a pin, and stepping on his heels, when they were in the back part of the room, where the teacher would not see him. The King of Boyville walked home that evening. The courtiers saw plainly that his majesty was troubled.

After this feat the king was quiet. At dusk, when the evening chores were done, Piggy Pennington walked past the home of his Heart's Desire and howled out a doleful ballad which began:

"You ask what makes this darkey wee-eep.
Why he like others am not gay."

But a man on the sidewalk passing, said: "Well, son, that's pretty good, but wouldn't you just as lief sing as to make that noise?" So the king went to bed with a heavy heart.

He took that heart to school with him the next morning, and dragged it over the school ground, playing crack the whip and "stink-base." But when he saw Heart's Desire wearing in her hair one of the white roses from his mother's garden—the Pennington's had the only white roses in the little town—he knew it was from the wreath which he had given her, and so light was his boyish heart that it was with an effort that he kept it out of his throat. There were smiles and smiles that day. During the singing they began, and every time she came past him from a class, and every time he could pry his eyes behind her geography, or her grammar, a flood of gladness swept over his soul. That night Piggy Pennington followed the girls from the schoolhouse to the post office, and in a burst of enthusiasm he walked on his hands in front of the crowd, for nearly a block. When his Heart's Desire said:

"Ah, ain't you afraid you'll hurt yourself, doing that?" Piggy pretended not to hear her, and said to the boys:

"Aw, that ain't nothin'; come down to my barn, an' I'll do somepin that'll make yer head swim."

He was too exuberant to contain himself, and when he left the girls he started to run after a stray chicken, that happened along, and ran till he was out of breath. He did not mean to run in the direction his Heart's Desire had taken, but he turned a corner, and came up with her suddenly.

Her eyes beamed upon him, and he could not run away, as he wished. She made room for him on the sidewalk, and he could do nothing but walk beside her. For a block they were so embarrassed that neither spoke.

It was Piggy who broke the silence. His words came from his heart. He had not yet learned to speak otherwise.

"Where's your rose?" he asked, not seeing it.

"What rose?" said the girl, as though she had never in her short life heard of such an [illegible] thing as a rose.

"Oh, you know!" [illegible] the boy, stepping [illegible] of his toes [illegible] sidewalk. [illegible] during which Piggy picked up a pebble and threw it at a bird in a tree. His heart was sinking rapidly.

"Oh, that rose?" said his Heart's Desire, turning full upon him with the enchantment of her [illegible]. "Why, here it is in my [illegible]. I'm taking it to [illegible] Why?"

"Oh, nothing [illegible]" [illegible]

RADIO

SIMPLE ANTENNA IS BEST FOR AMATEUR

Straight, Single Wire Type, Placed High, Is Preferable for the Receiving Set.

It is estimated that in one year's time from 700,000 to 1,000,000, new radio receivers were installed in the United States and from observation it would appear that there were almost as many different styles of antennae erected as there were sets installed. This, too, despite the fact that the country was flooded with literature telling each and every citizen how to build his own set.

These cage, flat-top, multi-wire, umbrella, etc., kinds of antenna were designed primarily for their sending characteristics. Remember that, in the beginning of radio, the man who wanted to hear wireless signals had to know quite a bit about practical radio. He had to know the Continental and Morse codes, and in addition to be a fairly decent sort of mechanic. He was, in short, the radio amateur, who wanted to send as well as receive. Therefore all this early literature was for the man who wanted to send as well as receive.

Since radiophone broadcasting was first started, there has grown up another army of radio enthusiasts, greatly outnumbering the pioneer amateurs, who do not want to send at all, but who do wish to receive. Therefore much of this early literature does not apply, or more correctly, all of it does not apply, to the new generation.

In building an antenna, remember that nothing is more satisfactory for the amateur than the straight, single wire antenna, as high in the air as it can be placed, and about 150 feet long. An antenna of this sort, will give better results, in most cases, than any other sort. It will take up less room, and will not cut so heavily into the owner's finances.

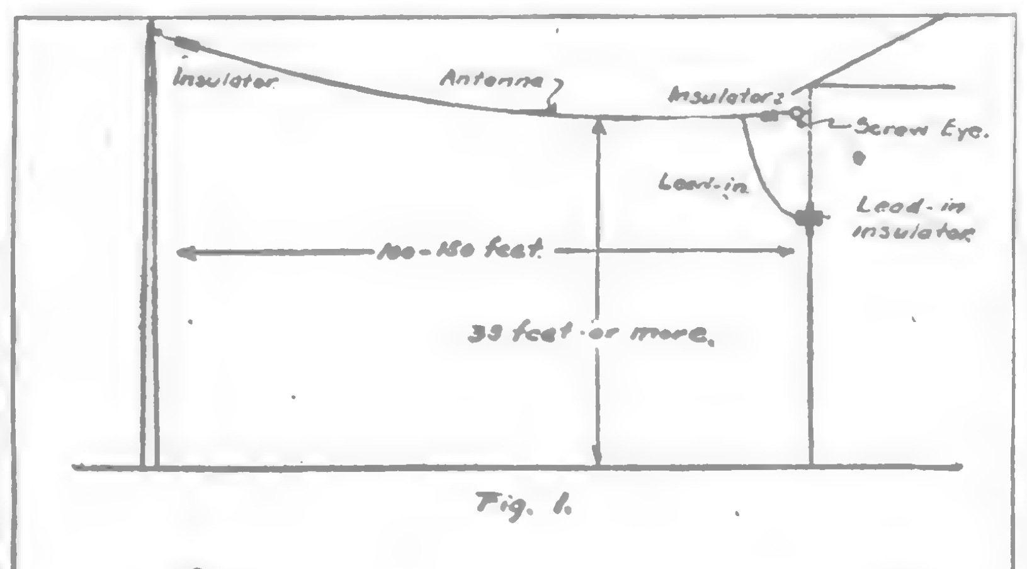


Fig. 1.

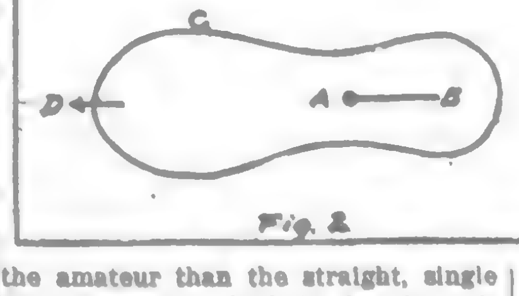

Fig. 2.

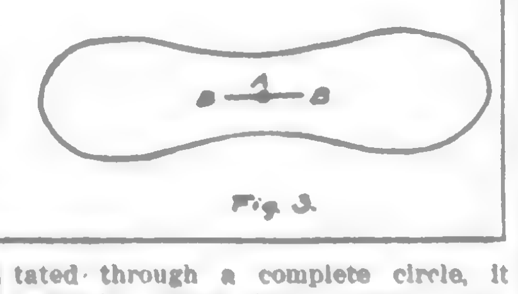

Fig. 3.

The function of the antenna for a receiving set is to absorb the maximum amount of energy radiated from a transmitter. This means that it must be so built and placed as to be as efficient as possible. The factors governing the type of aerial to be erected are as follows:

Amount of space available.

The amount of money which is to be spent.

The wave-length range which is to be received.

The distance from which signals are sent.

An aerial possesses both distributed capacity and inductance, which combined give it a defined period of oscillation. These oscillations will set up a wave motion the length of which is related to the capacity and inductance by a formula which can be closely approximated by multiplying the length of the antenna in feet, plus the length of the lead-in in feet, by 1.22. This will give the fundamental wave length of the antenna.

No matter what kind of antenna is used it must always be remembered that the lead-in should be as short and as direct as possible. In other words, don't use up any unnecessary energy received in the antenna to force a way through a long lead-in to the receiver.

If a multi-wire antenna is used, have the lead-in consist of as many wires as are in the antenna. These wires should be wrapped together at a point a few feet from the antenna and brought into the receiving set as a cable. Where this cable passes through the walls of the building, it should be insulated with porcelain tube or standard electrose lead-in insulators.

Be careful to keep the lead-in as far as possible from electric light wires, telephone wires, etc. If this is not done, an objectionable 60-cycle hum may be heard in the phones caused by electric [illegible] induction.

The ground connection should also be as short and direct as possible. Serving water pipes or gas pipes make excellent grounds, [illegible]

[illegible] of fine mesh chicken wire in a moist spot and connect the ground lead to this, or drive a six-foot length of galvanized pipe or copper rod into the ground.

All outdoor receiving or transmitting antenna should be protected by some form of lightning arrester or switch, approved by the National Board of Fire Underwriters. This switch must have at least a capacity of 100 amperes, 600 volts, and must be supported at least five inches from the side of the building. The ground connection from the switch consists of No. 10 B. & S. gauge copper wire, also supported five inches from the building.

If the antenna is to be used for receiving only, any one of the numerous approved lightning arresters now on the market will be satisfactory. However, these cannot be used for a transmitting station, as the current put into the antenna by the transmitter is in effect a miniature lightning discharge and would escape to the ground through the arrester.

One of the most satisfactory antenna for short wave reception consists of a single wire, 100 to 150 feet long, supported at least 40 feet above the ground, with the lead-in taken from one end. This wire should be placed so that it is free from all obstructions, such as trees and houses. If power or high tension transmission lines are in the immediate neighborhood of the antenna, it should be placed as nearly at right angles to the power lines as possible, in order to reduce the 60-cycle induction.

No. 12 or No. 14 hard drawn copper wire, or copper clad or copper weld of the same gauge make a very satisfactory antenna. Furthermore, this wire is strong enough to support itself, and will stand up in weather of all kinds. Phosphor bronze wire or standard copper cable has a higher tensile strength than a single wire, and therefore long spans may be safely made, but the receptional qualities of these wires are not noticeably superior to the wires first mentioned.

If a single wire antenna were rotated through a complete circle, it would be noticed that a certain transmitting station would come in loudest when the antenna was in a certain definite position. That is, a single straight away antenna receives signals better from one direction than from others. This is illustrated in Figure 2, which shows the directional characteristics of this type of antenna. "A" shows the lead-in and "B" the direction in which the antenna is stretched.

If a transmitting station of constant power were moved around the receiver along the path of the curved line "C," the signals from this transmitter would come in with equal intensity at all positions. Conversely, stations from the direction "D" will be received over greater distances than those in any other direction. Keep in mind the direction of the transmitting station from which it is desired to catch signals and point the free end of the antenna away from the station.

If the lead-in is brought in from the center of the antenna, its fundamental wave length will be decreased, and its directional characteristics will be similar to that shown in Figure 3.

CATCHING COLD IS NOT AN ACCIDENT

The Penalty for Neglect of Health Rules

Take Father John's Medicine

When you catch cold you are inclined to think that it was accidental, that you sat in a draft or that you caught it from someone else. This is only half the truth. The real fact is that a cold is the penalty for neglect of the common rules of health. You have allowed yourself to become overtired, weakened and run down. You have allowed your power of resistance to be lowered. The cold germ which is always lurking nearby finds you an easy victim.

You can maintain your power of resistance to colds, coughs and similar trouble by taking Father John's medicine, which builds new strength and health. If you have already allowed yourself to take cold, begin treating it at once with Father John's Medicine. It will not only drive off the cold but it will build up new strength with which to fight off future attacks.

Total expenditures were $11,000,000, compared with $13,000,000 for the previous year, the Scientific American states. The True Facts About Your Tax

There has been much said about t tremendous increase in Taxes in DeKa County the past few years, but peo somehow have the habit of doing a lot talking about tax paying time each ye and then forgetting them altogether, else permit their minds to be confus regarding the facts until the next tax pa ing period. For this reason we have ta en the trouble to make a comparati statement of the last two administratio in DeKalb County, which is as follows:

Taxes charged for year	1915	$88,931.64
" " " "	1916	$90,442.24
" " " "	1917	$91,654;25
" " " "	1918	$93,242;44

Total Increase for the Four year period $4,310.8

This covers the period of the last Democratic Administra Now let us see what has happened during the present Republ Administration.

Taxes charged for year	1919	$ 96,599.66
" " " "	1920	$104,965.72
" " " "	1921	$192,861.85
" " " "	1922	$265,653.19

Total Increase for the Four year period $169,053

This covers the peirod of the present Republican Adminis tion, and these figures cannot be disputed, as they were t from the official Tax Duplicates now on record in the De County Court House.

You know from personal experience that you have been paying TH times as much taxes as you were prior to 1921, and these figures given only prove it to your better satisfaction.

In the year 1920 the Democratic Publicity Committee published a com tive statement of taxes at that time, showing whereby and how much you es would be increased and immediately following that the Repulicans iss statement denying its truth. Now you are able to judge for yourselves of these statements was correct, and which was incorrect.

THEY ARE RIGHT

Many of our customers are asking if these Slate-covered Asphalt shingles are a success. Thousands of squares of them have been sold and used in the last 15 or 20 years. If they are no good, many a man would have found it out before now. Care must be used in laying them—just like any other roof—but we believe that they are alright. They are beautiful and durable. Fire-proof and fashionable. If they're no good, we've been like the young man who bought the diamond for fifty cents. If it's no good he's been skinned out of half a dollar.

We've just bought a car load of these shingles, such as we have been selling for several years past. We're not afraid of them.

Of course the butcher was sarcastic and not any too polite. The Hunting Party Leaves For Maine

On last Saturday evening the 6:40 Wabash train took on the Widney Hunting Party and started it off on its trip to Maine to spend a month in the "big woods."

There were nineteen in the party when it left and Mr. Widney stated that there would be one or two more to join them about election day. Each member took with him his ejuipment and some food provisions, which when taken all together made quite a load of express.

The names of the members excepting two are as follows: James Wright of Kendalville, L. B. Heller of Mishawaka, Dr. Ed. Showalter and son of Waterloo, Col. W. W. Bowman of Waterloo, J. W. Markley of Waterloo, Harry Brown of Auburn, Capt. L. L. Dennison of Garrett, Senator Lee Hartzell of Ft. Wayne, Carson Culler and Merritt Hull of St, Joe, John Koons of Sherwood, O., Daniel Kurtz of Mark Center, O., Clyde Zies of Hicksville, O., Wesley Johnson of Hicksville, O., Frank Silberg of Spencerville, and H. M. Widney of St. Joe. There are two men from Lewisville, Indiana, whose names we did not learn, also in the party.

Harry Kimes of St. Joe, one who has not missed a trip for 25 years, was not able to accompany the party this year on account of his health. Mr. Kimes is getting pretty old for such a trip and has not been in good health all summer. However he is hoping to feel able to follow the party about November 7th. It is a big disappointment to Mr. Kimes to not be able to go.

For some members of the party this will be their first trip and they are assured by the older members of a good time. By special invitation Mr. Widney takes this as an honorary guest party to the camps of the Great Northern Paper Company of Greenville. For this reason their camps will be free. Their post-office address will be Kokadjo, Maine, c|o Grant Farm Deerpond Camps, and their wire address will be Greenville, Maine, c|o Great Northern Paper Company.

It made some of the men make tracks to get their work out of the way to be able to go with the party. A story is told on one member that he was found in the bath room at 20 minutes before train time and had he not had several to help him with his clothes, etc., and had the train not been 25 minutes late, he would have been out of luck.

Culture Club Hallow-een Party

The Culture Club of St. Joe, Indiana, spent a most enjoyable evening at the home of Mrs. Pluma Hamilton on October 25. This meeting was given in horor of the children of the community, each member inviting one child. The decorations and program featured the Hallowe'en season. Each person upon arriving was conducted by ghosts through a dark passage way leading to the reception room. When the guests masked as a Jack 'O Lantern were assembled each child was then the witch appeared and each child proved himself a true Jack 'O Lantern by following out the instructions given by the witch. CLASS NOTES

SOPHOMORE:

We as a class endeavored to entertain the school this morning. Our exercises lasted over a period of thirty minutes and during that time we did a number of things, some of which were the telling of ghost stories, displaying our musical ability and the giving of a Latin playlet.

The grades from four tests were given to us today. Naturally some of our class are feeling blue.

S. E. K.

JUNIOR:

The Juniors regret the absence of their classmate, Virginia Lawson, who has, because of illness, been unable to attend school for the past week.

Owing to the fact that there is to be no lecture course this winter, we feel quite fortunate in being able to bring, to the people of the community, an opportunity for a first class entertainment. The Junior Class has engaged Geo. R. Laird, a well-known humorist and lecturer, to present a program in St. Joe. He will lecture on some of our present day problems in such an entertaining manner that you cannot afford to miss this opportunity to hear him. Therefore mark Saturday night, Dec. 2, as a red letter date.

Help boost St. Joe High School.

SENIOR:

Road Improvements

Road improvements were in evidence last week and are being continued this week around St. Joe. One of the old hang-overs that has been the cause of more talk and less action than perhaps any other public question has finally received the action, and this to the joy of all. This is the quarter mile of road between the east end of the stone road and Hanabaugh's corners west of town.

The grading was started several weeks ago but not finished until last week when it was put in fine shape for gravel. The graveling work has also been completed.

[illegible] Monday morning, this [illegible] began hauling gravel [illegible] highway to the county seat.

The other improvement is on the road east of town from the grist mill. The hole in the grade at Bear Creek made by the dredge several weeks ago, has been filled. It was partly filled just after the dredge passed but not at all satisfactorily. When the loose dirt settled and some of it caved down and washed away it left a very poor and even dangerous pass for vehicles to cross.

Many complaints were filed to the town board by people who had to use that road and when the question came up and was [illegible] as to who should fill the [illegible] road was [illegible]

Furthermore the road from the creek bridge to the railroad crossing at the grist mill was graveled last week. Now, all the roads leading into St. Joe are graveled and in good shape. If consistant care is given them we will have splendid highways for a good many years to come round St. Joe.

For good glasses see Griest at American Building Hicksville, Ohio.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Oberholtzer were surprised when the following people came in with well filled baskets and spread a family dinner Sunday. [illegible]

—16—

The Gangsters.

Gramont left the covert and walked forward.

He was thinking about that odd mention of Jachin Fell—had Chacherre lied in saying he had come here on his master's business? Perhaps. The man had come in Fell's car, and would not hesitate to lie about using the car. For the moment Gramont put away the circumstance, but did not forget it.

He walked openly toward the Gumberts buildings, thinking that he would have time for a good look around the place before dusk fell; he would then get off for Houma and attend to Hammond's defense.

As for the place before him, he was convinced that it was abandoned. Had any one, other than Chacherre and his two friends, been about the buildings, the late excitement would have brought out the fact. No one had appeared and the buildings seemed vacant.

Gramont's intent was simple and straightforward. In case he found, as he expected to find, any evidence of illegal occupation about the place—as the sheriff seemed to have discovered to his cost—he would lay Chacherre and the other two men by the heels that night in Houma. He would then go on to New Orleans and have Gumberts arrested, although he had no expectation that the master crook could be held on the murder-accessory charge. If this place were used for the lotteries, even, he was fairly certain that Memphis Izzy would have his own tracks covered. The men higher up always did.

He walked straight in upon the barn. It loomed before him, closed, lurid in the level rays of the westering sun. The doors in front had been only loosely swung together and Gramont found them unlocked. He stood in the opening, and surprise gripped him. He was held motionless, gazing with astonished wonder at the sight confronting him.

Directly before him was a small roadster, one which he remembered to have seen Jachin Fell using; in this car, doubtless, Ben Chacherre had driven from the city. He recalled the fact later, with poignant regret for a lost opportunity. But, at the present moment, he was lost in amazement at the great number of other cars presenting themselves to his view.

They were lined up as deep as the barn would hold them, crammed into every available foot of space; well over a dozen cars, he reckoned swiftly. What was more, all were cars of the highest class, with the exception of Fell's roadster. Directly before him were two which he was well aware must have cost close upon ten thousand each. What did this mean? Certainly no one man or one group of men, in this back-country spot, could expect to use such an accumulation of expensive cars!

Gramont glanced around, but found no trace of machinery in the barn. Remembering the motor that he had heard, he turned from the doorway in frowning perplexity. He strode on toward the long shed which stood closer to the house. At the end of this shed was a door, and when he tried it, Gramont found it unlocked. It swung open to his hand, and he stepped inside.

At first he paused, confused by the vague objects around, for it was quite dark in here. A moment, and his eyes grew accustomed to the gloomier lighting. Details came to him: all around were cars and fragments of cars, chassis and bodies in all stages of dismemberment. Still more cars!

He slowly advanced to a long bench that ran the length of the [illegible] beneath the windows. A [illegible]—a shop, he quickly [illegible], fitted with every tool and machine necessary to the most [illegible] repair [illegible]. Even [illegible] brush [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] compartment [illegible] paint pots.

Comprehension was slowly dawning upon [illegible] [illegible] en-gine Gramont's eyes fell upon a typed sheet of paper affixed to the wall above the bench. His gaze widened as he inspected it by the failing light. Upon that paper was a list of cars. After each car was a series of numbers plainly comprising the original numbers of the engine, body, radiator and other component parts, followed by another series of new numbers to be inserted. That sheet of paper showed brains, organizing ability, care and attention to the last detail!

Here was the most carefully planned and thorough system of automobile thievery that Gramont had ever heard of. He stood motionless, knowing that this typed sheet of paper in itself was damning evidence against the whole gang of workers. What was more to the point, that paper could be traced; the typewriting could be traced to the man higher up—doubtless Memphis Izzy himself! These men ran in cars by the wholesale, probably from states adjacent to Louisiana. Here, at this secluded point on the bayou, they changed the cars completely about, in number, paint, style of body, and then probably got rid of the new product in New Orleans.

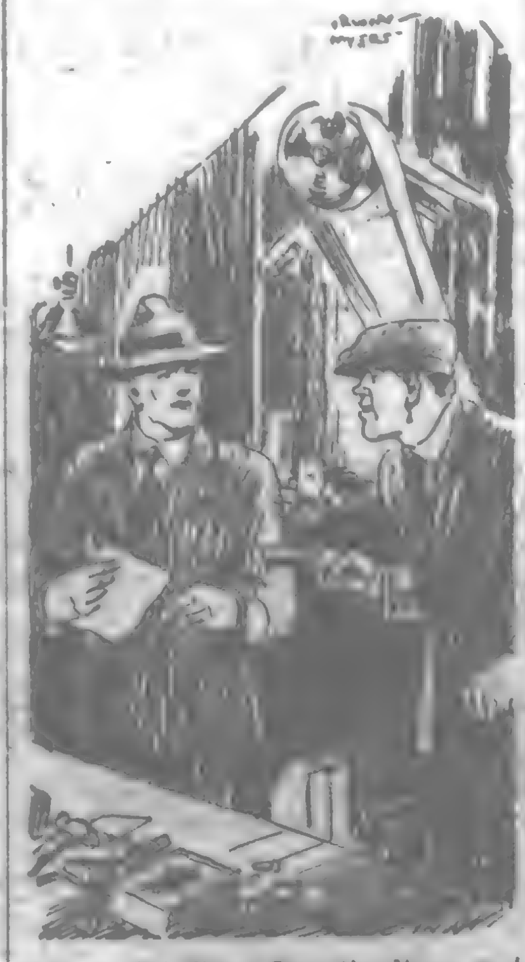
Gramont stood motionless. Surprise had taken hold of him, and even a feeling of slight dismay. This was not at all what he had hoped to find there. He had thought to come upon some traces of the lottery game—

"Seen all you want, bo?" said a voice behind him.

Gramont turned. He found himself gazing directly into an automatic pistol over which glittered a pair of blazing eyes. The man was a stranger to him. The place had not been deserted, after all. He was caught.

"Who are you?" demanded Gramont, quietly.

"Me?" The stranger was unsmiling, deadly. In those glittering eyes Gramont read the ferocity of an animal



"Hurry Up! Turn Over the Name and Address."

at bay. "I s'pose you would like to know that, huh? I guess you know enough right now to get all that's comin' to you, bo! Got any particular business here? Speak up quick!"

Gramont was silent. The other sneered at him, viciously.

"Hurry up! Turn over the name and address, and I'll notify the survivin' relatives. Name, please?"

"Henry Gramont," was the calm response. "Don't get hasty, my friend. Didn't you see me here a little while ago with Chacherre and the other boys?"

"What's that?" The glittering eyes flamed up with suspicion and distrust. "Here—why, no! No, I didn't. I [illegible] to be in partnership with a man named Jachin Fell, and I came out here on business—"

[illegible]

To Gramont's astonishment the pistol was lowered instantly. It was well that he ceased speaking, for what he had just said proved to be open to misconstruction, and if he had said any more he would have spoiled it. For the man facing him was staring at him in mingled disgust and surprise.

"You're in partnership with the boss!" came the astounding words. "Well, why in h—l didn't you say all that in the first place, instead o' beefin' around? That's no way to butt in, and me thinking you was some dick on the job! Got anything to prove that you ain't pullin' something cute on me?"

"Do you know Fell's writing?" asked Gramont, with difficulty forcing himself to meet the situation coherently. Jachin Fell—the boss!

"I know his mitt, all right."

From his pocket Gramont produced a paper—the memorandum or agreement which he had drawn up with Fell the previous afternoon, relating to the oil company. The other man took it and switched on an electric light bulb overhead. In this glare he was revealed as a ratty little individual with open mouth and teeth hanging out—an adenoidal type, and certainly a criminal type.

It crossed the mind of Gramont that one blow would do the work—but he stood motionless. No sudden game would help him here. The discovery that Fell was "the boss" paralyzed him completely. He had never dreamed of such a contingency. Fell, of all men!

Jachin Fell the "boss" of this establishment! Jachin Fell the man higher up—the brains behind this criminal organization! It was a perfect thunderbolt to Gramont. Now he understood why Chacherre was in the employ of Fell—why no arrest of the man had been possible! Now he perceived that Chacherre must have told the truth about coming here on business for Fell. Reaching farther back, he saw that Fell must have received the loot of the Midnight Masquer, must have turned it over to Lucie Ledanois—

Did she know?

"All right, Mr. Gramont." The ratty little man turned to him with evident change of front. "We ain't takin' no chances here, y'understand. Got quite a shipment of cars comin' in from Texas, and we're tryin' to get some o' these boats cleaned out to make room. Bring out any orders?"

Gramont's brain worked fast.

By overcoming this guttersnipe he might have the whole place at his mercy—but that was not what he wanted. He suddenly realized that he had other and more important fish to fry in New Orleans. Gumberts was there. Fell was there. What he must do demanded time, and his best play was to gain all the time possible, and to prevent this gang from suspecting him in any way.

"Did you see Ben Chacherre?" he countered.

"Uh-huh—seen him just after he come. Gumberts will be out day after tomorrow, he said. The boss is framin' some sort of deal on a guy that he wants laid away—some guy name o' Hammond. Chacherre is running it. He figgers on gettin' Hammond on account of some car that's bein' hunted up—"

Gramont laughed suddenly, for there was a grim humor about the thing. So Jachin Fell wanted to "get something" on poor Hammond! And Chacherre had seized the golden opportunity that presented itself this afternoon—instead of "getting" Hammond for the theft of a car, Chacherre had coolly fastened murder upon him!

"Ben is one smart man; I expect he thinks the gods are working for him," said Gramont, thinly. "So you don't know what happened today, eh? Well, it's great news, but I've got no time to talk about it. They'll tell you when they get back—"

"Where'd they go?" demanded the other.

"Houma. Now listen close! Chacherre did not know that I was in partnership with the boss, get me? I didn't want to tell all the crowd in front of him. Between you and me, the boss isn't any too sure about Ben—"

"Say, I get you there!" broke in the other, sagely. "I tells him six months ago to watch out for that Creole guy!"

"Exactly. You can tell the boys about me when they come back—I don't suppose Ben will be with them. Now, I've been looking over that place next door—"

"Oh!" exclaimed the other, suddenly. "Sure! The boss said that one of his friends would be down to—"

"I'm the one—or one of them," and Gramont chuckled as he [illegible]

ROAD RESEARCH INVESTIGATIONS OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

A Macadam Road in Virginia.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The road research investigations of the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture at the Arlington experiment station are now well under way.

A new portable road-impact machine has been received and is giving most satisfactory results in testing the series of road slabs placed earlier in the season. This series consists of 120 concrete slabs ranging from four to ten inches in thickness and from lean to rich mixtures. Some of the slabs are reinforced and others have a two-inch Topeka top. There are at least two slabs of each type of construction, one on a dry subgrade and another surrounded by ditches, which are kept flooded.

What the Machine Does.

Briefly the new machine consists of a typical truck wheel with spring and variable load above it, which is raised and allowed to fall on the slab from any desired height by means of an electrically-driven cam. Recording devices measure the deceleration or rate at which the wheel is brought to rest after coming in contact with the slab, the deflection of the slab at a number of points on a line across the slab, settlement of the slab into the subgrade, permanent set of the slab and the maximum instantaneous fiber stress at the point where the blow is struck.

On the first slab tested the various recording devices checked each other with surprising closeness. For a series of blows varying slightly in intensity, curves for the fiber stress, deceleration and deflection showed corresponding variations and gave assurance as to the accuracy of the new methods of measuring. Some interesting information as to the variation of the support offered the slab by the subgrade under a series of varying blows is being secured.

New Light on Impact.

With the information and experience gained from last year's experiments on impact making possible refinements in the new tests, it is thought that an analysis of the data when all of the slabs are tested to destruction will throw a great deal of new light on truck impact on rigid pavements.

The circular track for the testing of asphaltic concrete to determine the cause of waving is now about ready for the automatically controlled truck traffic. Twenty-seven sections of asphaltic concrete of various mixtures have been laid on a cement base, the coarse aggregate of the bituminous mixes ranging from 40 to 70 per cent, with variations in the grading of the finer material. The amount of asphalt varies from 5.0 to 7.0 per cent and has a penetration value of from 45 to 85.

In line with the bureau's policy of cheapening the cost of road construction by the use of local material wherever possible, a circular track for a wear test on concrete has been completed. Sixty-one sections of concrete have been placed. The aggregates used vary in kind and quality, ranging from hard to soft, and there is variation in the amount of mixing water and time of mixing. In order to eliminate the effect of differences in the subgrade the sections are of reinforced T-beam construction, the slab being 4 feet wide, 10 inches deep, with the T-beam in the middle of the slab. The traffic test on these sections will begin soon and the load on the pavement will be made to represent the rubber-tired rear wheel of a 3½ or 5-ton truck moving at a speed of 15 to 20 miles per hour. Specimens of concrete for beam strength and compression tests have been made from each mix and are being cured under the same conditions as the corresponding sections.

Change in Specifications.

Results of this wear test, representing modern traffic conditions, together with the beam strength and compression tests which will be made for this investigation and on a similar set made in connection with the impact investigation and which will serve to tie the two together, will furnish a sound basis for the consideration of suggested changes in specifications for concrete road aggregates.

TIMBER SALE SHOULD BE ARRANGED AHEAD

Quick Action Needed to Prevent Deterioration.

Logs and Other Rough Material Should Not Be Allowed to Remain Long on Ground After Cutting—Ends Should Be Painted.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

To prevent the deterioration of felled timber farmers and owners of woodlands should allow as little delay as possible between the cutting of the tree and its manufacture into rough products, advises the forest service of the United States Department of Agriculture. This means that sales should be arranged for prior to beginning cutting. It is often necessary or desirable, however, to put off the delivery of logs, bolts, or poles until some months after cutting, either to allow them to season or because a good sale cannot be arranged at once. Much of the weight of freshly-cut timber is due to the water it contains, and a few months' seasoning will often reduce this to a marked degree, the amount of reduction depending, of course, on the climate, the weather, and the exposure to sun and air. At the same time, unless preventive measures are taken the products are sure to deteriorate through decay, insect attack, checking, or some other agency.

Logs and other round timber should never be allowed to remain long in the [illegible] after cutting. As soon as [illegible] to a [illegible] area and [illegible] off the ground; otherwise [illegible]

[illegible] convenient time without regard to seasoning, directly to the railway, and pile them according to the specifications furnished by the tie buyer.

Cordwood should be stacked in loose piles in a sunny, well-aired, and well-drained place free from rank vegetation. Two sticks on the ground running the length of the pile will keep it from contact with the soil and thus prevent decay in the lower layers.

Additional information on this subject is contained in Farmers' Bulletin 1210, Measuring and Marketing Farm Timber, copies of which may be had free upon application to the division of publications, United States Department of Agriculture.

SOCIETY MEN WEAR CORSETS

Fad Spreading in England, and Said to Be by No Means Confined to Fops.

The corset-wearing habit among men is coming into vogue again, says an investigator in England.

"A leading London corsetiere who supplies most society men, puts down a good customer's bill at $750 per annum. Let no one imagine that it is only fops who wear them. The majority of wearers are military men, who, I learn, require a greater amount of padding than civilians. Others are ordinary well-dressed men, given to manly sports, and by no means effeminate.

"A man's figure has to be gradually coaxed into shape, and is put first of all into a soft silk corset with scarcely any bones, until he attains by degrees to the full glory of the perfect figure.

"This process usually takes three months, and five special makes of corsets are employed in the development, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say the 'repression,' of the figure."

Cause for Apprehension.

"You must have been right smartly agitated tuther night when the White Caps came and drug your brother-in-law out to whip him?" inquiringly said a neighbor.

"You bet your life, I was!" replied Gap Johnson of Rumpus Ridge. "I 'lowed for a spell it was somebody trying to steal my dogs."—Kansas City Star.

Practical Suggestions Given by the Women Whose Letters Follow

Phila., Pa.—"When I was going through the Change of Life I was weak, nervous, dizzy and had headaches. I was troubled in this way for two years and was hardly able to do my work. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in your little books and took it with very good results. I keep house and am able now to do all my own work. I recommend your medicine and am willing for you to publish my testimonial."—Mrs. J. S. LIVERNOIS, 2051 Junction Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

The critical time of a woman's life usually comes between the years of 45 and 50, and is often beset with annoying symptoms such as nervousness, irritability, melancholia. Heat flashes or waves of heat appear to pass over the body, cause the face to be very red and often bring on headache, dizziness and a sense of suffocation.

Another annoying symptom which comes at this time is an inability to recall names, dates or other small facts. This is liable to make a woman lose confidence in herself. She becomes nervous, avoids meeting strangers and dreads to go out alone.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is especially adapted to help women at this time. It exercises a restorative influence, tones and strengthens the system, and assists nature in the long weeks and months covering this period. Let it help carry you through this time of life. It is a splendid medicine for the middle-aged woman. It is prepared from medicinal roots and herbs and contains no harmful drugs or narcotics.

J. Frank McDowell

Republican Candidate for Reelection as County Surveyor.

To the Voters of DeKalb County:

I am a candidate for Surveyor and hold a license as a professional engineer as required by law. If elected, it is my ambition to work for your interest as your Surveyor; to do your surveying; to do your road, bridge and drainage engineering; to grant you equal rights to all, special privilege to none, and to treat you at all times with courtesy and respect. Your support will be appreciated.

J. Frank McDowell

To The Voters Of DeKalb County

Being a candidate for the office of County Auditor of this county and being unable to meet each of you, I believe I should present some of the reasons why I solicit your support.

I was born and have always lived in DeKalb County and have been a taxpayer since I became of age, have owned real estate in this county since 1905 and at bresent am living on a farm which I own and operate, located about one mile south of Waterloo, have had five years experience as deputy in the office and three years as bookkeeper in the City National Bank of Auburn, Indiana.

I consider a public office as a public trust and the success of a public official should be measured by the service he renders. Remember you are going to hire one of us to do that work and the salary will be the same, and remember further that this county does not owe me or any other candidate one dollar. An official should earn his pay by the service he renders while in office. The difference to you Mr. and Mrs. Voter, will be the service received.

I earnestly ask your unbiased consideration and appeal for your support on the grounds of length of residence in the County, of being a taxpayer, and as such appreciate the burden of experience in the office, and of proven efficiency in Both public and private business.

Sincerly yours,
Frank Shook

THE UNIVERSAL CAR

Prices Cut

50 Per Cent Lower Than In 1920

According to a statement just issued by Edsel B. Ford, president of the Ford Motor Company, Detroit, a general reduction of $50.00 a car has been made in the prices of Ford Model T Cars and the Ford 1-Ton Truck, effective October 17.

"The revision in prices," said Mr. Ford, "is the result of the increased volume of business which our company has enjoyed during the present year, and also, to the fact that we now own and operate many of our own sources of raw material, which enables us to continue increasing the quality of our product and at the same time keep the price so low that Ford cars are in reach of everybody.

"Our production for 1922 is already in excess of a million, which has been an important factor in bringing down costs. Our present daily output is averaging better than 5,000 cars and trucks, which means a complete Ford car or truck every 5½ seconds of each 8 hour working day. It is in anticipation of this continued demand that price abjustments are again being made in order keep in effect the policy of selling Ford products at the lowest price consistent with quality.

"Quality, as usual, will continue to be prime consideration in the building of Ford Cars As our business has increased we have constantly insreased our equipment and manufacturing facilities, so that this price reduction merelyreflects the progressive methods which come as a result of increased volume.

"This reduction, which is the sixth since March 1920, brings the price of the Ford Touring Car from $575, the price in effect early in 1920, to the present extremely low level of $298, which is nearly 50 per cent less. Corresponding reductions have made on all other types."

The New Prices By Types, F. O. B. Detroit, are as follows:

LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 5

JESUS THE GREAT PHYSICIAN

LESSON TEXT—Luke 4:31-44; 5:12-26.

GOLDEN TEXT—Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses.—Matt. 8:17.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Matt. 9:35-38; Mark 1:21-45.

PRIMARY TOPIC—How a Sick Man Was Brought to Jesus.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Healing the Paralytic.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus' Power to Forgive Sin.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus' Ministry to Human Need.

Since the topic sets forth Jesus as the Great Physician, it will be better for adult classes, especially, to take the larger text chosen by the committee and note the several outstanding cases of His healing. For some classes it will be better to study the one case of healing, namely, the healing of the paralytic.

I. Jesus Healing a Demoniac (4:31-37).

While engaged in teaching in the synagogue He was interrupted by a man who had an unclean spirit. Jesus rebuked the demon and compelled him to come out of the man. This healing shows Jesus not only gracious, but powerful to set free the whole brood of diabolical passions, such as lust, envy, anger and jealousy which rule men.

II. Jesus Heals a Woman of a Great Fever (vv. 38:39).

Peter's mother-in-law was prostrate with a great fever. They of Peter's household besought Jesus for her. Jesus rebuked the fever and it left her so that she immediately rose and ministered unto them. No earthly physician had ever been known to heal in that way. Divine healing is immediate and complete. We should distinguish between divine healing and faith healing. Faith healing is the result of the action of the mind upon the body and is measured by the degree of the faith, while divine healing is the action of the power of God upon the diseased one, and is always complete and immediate, because it is measured by the power of the Healer, God. His fame spread abroad and many sick of divers diseases were brought unto Him and He healed them all, even casting out demons and forbidding them to testify of Him.

III. Jesus Heals a Leper (5:12-16).

Leprosy was a most loathsome and terrible disease. Because of its foulness one afflicted therewith was an outcast. The disease was incurable by man, therefore the leper was regarded as hopeless and dead. In response to the leper's earnest request Jesus touched him and bade the leprosy to depart, and immediately he was healed and cleaned. Leprosy is a type of sin. Jesus has power to heal and cleanse and restore.

IV. Jesus Heals a Paralytic (5:17-26).

1. Watched by the Pharisees and Doctors (v. 1). Jesus' fame spread abroad, and this only incited jealousy on the part of these men.

2. The Paralytic Brought (vv. 18, 19). This is a fine lesson in Christian service. They could not heal the man, but could bring him to Jesus, who could heal and restore. They had faith in Jesus to heal him. No effort which is required to bring a sinner to Jesus should be regarded as too great.

3. The Man's Sins Forgiven (v. 20). Jesus looked back of the palsy to its cause—sin. All disease and death is the result of sin. Jesus saw the faith of those not only who brought him, but of the man himself.

4. The Purpose of Miracles (vv. 21, 22). The Pharisees accused Christ of blasphemy when He declared the man's sins forgiven. Jesus showed them that back of the [illegible]

GOOD ROADS

INCREASE IN MOTOR TRUCKS

Business of Nation Turning More and More to Highway Transportation, Say Statistics.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

That the business of the nation is turning more and more to highway transportation is indicated by statistics on motor-vehicle registration as of July 1, compiled by the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture. Registration of passenger cars, taxis, busses, and motor trucks totaled 10,620,471 on this date, an increase of 157,176, which is a healthy growth, as the first half of the year is the off season for registration of new vehicles.

The surprising fact, however, is that of the 157,174 increase in registration; motor trucks constituted 116,701, against 35,030 passenger cars and 5,443 taxis and busses. This means an increase of over 16 per cent of the number of motor trucks at the beginning of the year. Figures are not available to show what part of the increase of 5,443, or nearly 11 per cent, in the taxi and bus registration is due to the increase in the number of busses traversing rural and suburban routes, but it is very probable that a considerable part of the increase is due to the development of this new form of transportation.

It has been frequently said that the traffic is always ready and waiting when good roads are built, and that the commercial vehicle as a class is more handicapped by lack of good roads than the pleasure vehicle. The increase in the registration of commercial vehicles, coupled with the present activity in highway construction, seems to bear out this statement in the opinion of department officials.

Motor Truck Is More Handicapped by Lack of Good Roads Than Pleasure Vehicle.

The table of statistics issued by the bureau shows a registration of 9,467,874 private cars, 55,990 taxis and busses, and 1,096,605 motor trucks, making a total of 10,620,471. Motor cycles are not included, there being 149,924 against 196,231 at the beginning of the year.

LINE HIGHWAYS WITH TREES

Forestry Department of Minnesota Plans to Set Out 30,000 Plants Along Roads.

To make Minnesota famous as "the state with the tree-lined highways" is the object which the forestry department of that state has set out to accomplish. The department will plant 30,000 trees along the highways this year and each year hereafter will add to the number. What Minnesota is doing is also being done in Pennsylvania and other states. Experts say if the trees are set back far enough their roots will not injure road pavements. It was contended at one time that tree roots and the shade cast by the branches were detrimental to asphalt paving, but experience in Washington, D. C., and other cities, especially in [illegible], Illinois, Massachusetts and [illegible], has proved the falsity of that idea.

Shot!

Maurice, nine years old, received the anti-toxin treatment when a diphtheria epidemic seemed imminent in the town where he lived just at the beginning of the school term.

A few days after the little fellow's visit to the doctor a friend, grown-up, met Maurice on the street and he was stiffly stalking along leaning heavily on a slender pole in his hands. Thinking he was acting, as children are wont to do, she gayly inquired:

"Why, Maurice, what is the matter with you?"

Maurice stopped and eyed her for a few seconds, surprise, interrogation and disgust mingled in his look, and then:

"Why, I got shot!" he exclaimed.—Indianapolis News.

FATHER OF BLOCK SIGNALIN

Name of William Robinson Written Large in the History of Railway Transportation.

An automatic electric system of railroad signaling was put into successful operation for the first time 50 years ago. It was the invention of William Robinson, and the trial to which he submitted his signaling appliances was made early in September, 1872, at the town of Kinzua, on the old Philadelphia & Erie railway, in northern Pennsylvania.

Mr. Robinson is very generally referred to as "the father of automatic block signaling." His invention is recognized as the forerunner and at the same time the basis of "practically every automatic electric block signal system in use on railroads today."

This tribute to his work appeared in a recent report of the interstate commerce commission: "Perhaps no single invention in the history of the development of railway transportation has contributed more toward safety and dispatch in that field than the closed track circuit."

THE PRODIGAL DAUGHTER

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

Folks like to pamper the prodigal son
—Maybe no more than they'd orter—
But no one as yet has been able to get Any veal for his prodigal daughter.
—From "The Rhymed Reflections of Elder Twiggs."

A FEW years ago the Beasly girl worked in the overall factory. She was a pretty girl then, and naturally the neighbors talked about her, for the people who live along Jersey Creek are really no better than they who live on Independence avenue, in spite of the theories that poverty and charity go together. So when she left the factory the women of the Jersey Creek neighborhood hinted that the foreman had been too polite to her. But if she had remained at the factory they would have given the same reason for her staying. After that, she went to the theater with young men who turned up their coat collars and wore their hands in their pockets in the fall and spring, in lieu of overcoats. During the summer following her discharge from the overall factory she became a park fiend.

When she gave up her counter in the cheap dry-goods store, she remained at home, apparently keeping house for her father. He worked in "the shops" somewhere over in "the bottoms," and came home tired and grimy at night, and went to bed early. He slept in the room off the kitchen, and his daughter slept in the front room. He did not know when she came in at night, and he did not think of caring to know. Her father paid no attention to the little brother and sister who teased the daughter at table about the young men who frequented the house. If the other members of the family had been plaguing the ten-year-old girl who led in the raillery, the father would have been equally heedless of their chatter. The eldest daughter made him very happy by simple tenderness, though, of course, he did not understand that his warmth for her and the longing which he felt all day to get home for supper, was happiness.

But, unconsciously, his daughter grew very necessary to him. He was not of the world that analyzes its emotions, yet he could not fail to see her beauty, nor to be proud of her for it; and when she was dressed to go out—and she went out early and often—his pride blinded him to the gaudiness of her clothes, her frowzy hair, and the shocking make-up on her pretty face. Probably his discernment was not keen enough to see these faults, even had he not been so fond of her. But other fathers who had daughters saw these things, and mothers of the neighborhood who had sons did not mention the Beasly girl in the family circle. It was only after Miss Beasly had joined a comedy company, organized to play the "White Slave" and "Only a Farmer's Daughter" through the West, that her name was mentioned at all freely by Jersey Creek's aristocracy, and then it was as if she were dead. And Mrs. Hinkley, who took care of the children and looked after the lonely old man, often said to inquiring women of the neighborhood, "It would break your heart to see Mr. Beasly a-grievin' an' a-grievin' for that hussy; an' whiniver he gets a letter from her he reads it at the supper table before them children wid that flourish you'd think—tch, tch, tch, I do wonder if he knows." And after some discussion she would sigh, "Well, it's not for me to tell him."

What a wonderful thing is absence. It is like the dark in its power to transform people and situations and the relations of things. Though she had grown up under his eyes, the old man and his daughter had scarcely spoken a serious word to each other. The father had never inquired what his daughter was or was not. She was only "her" in his thought. They were strangers, but when he began to forget her presence, he found himself continually thinking of things he would like to say to her. "Her" disappeared, and dreams altogether different from his former conception of her, took her place. He longed for her, and yearned to tell her the great love in his heart. Among the noisy wheels, he mumbled to himself, speeches that he wanted to make to her, and in the scrawled letter he sent her occasionally, he wrote some of these tender things.

One day she wrote that she was coming home for a vacation, and his heart was very glad. He read and re-read the letter, and droped it off at the supper table to Mrs. Hinkley and the children. As he read it, neither the hearers nor the reader realized how much feeling the writer had put into the matter-of-fact words. "I want to be home with you all again." These words were meant to tell a story of heartache and [illegible] despair but they were [illegible] and [illegible]. For poor people are as [illegible] as the [illegible] rich, and the [illegible] to Mrs. Hinkley of the possibility of any human feeling in the Beasly girl's heart would have [illegible] on [illegible].

When the day for the girl's coming [illegible] new happiness that had come to him, yet he feared that his daughter would be so far above him that she would not care for it. He put on his best suit of clothes, and sent the children away. The house was in conspicuous "company order"; he arranged things, himself, and a Sunday stiffness and quiet prevailed. He sat in the front room waiting for her. When he heard voices at the fence, he recognized that of his daughter, and his pulse quickened; but when he looked through the curtain and saw a stranger with her, his heart sank.

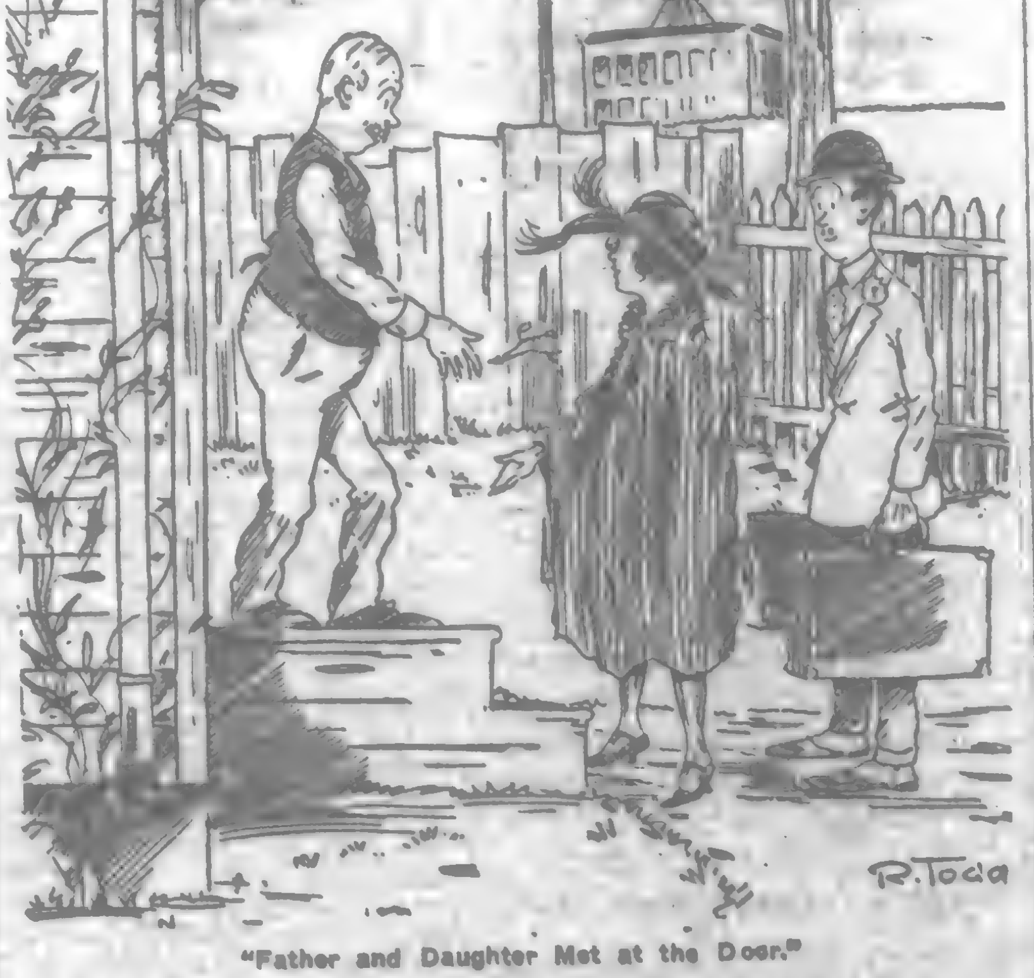
Father and daughter met at the door; he held out his hand to her and she passed in, followed by the stranger, while the father said awkwardly, "Well, Allie"—and after a pause, "how are you?"

A smile inclosed the commonplace answer, and the old man continued in a high-keyed tone with the upward inflection, looking vacantly at the dapper stranger who had not been introduced, "I s'pose you've been gettin' to be such a grand lady—" He laughed nervously, and with conscious embarrassment. The daughter seated her guest, and the father, with a feint at cheer, chirped, "Well, you're lookin' hale and hearty."

"Is there anything in the cupboard, pa?" asked the girl, as she took off her soiled gloves and threw her long, shabby cloak and her expensive, but betowsled hat upon the bed. "I am just dyin' for a bite; we didn't get any breakfast." The old man went to get something, and when he returned the stranger was gone. She did not taste what he had brought, but turned and threw her arms about his neck; there were tears in her eyes as she said, "Oh, pa—pa—ain't it good to be back again!"

The father, summoning all his courage to break away from the common words of welcome began again in a quavering, nervous voice, "Well, Allie—I guess 'at mebby you—you think someway that yer daddy has forgot you, but—Allie, I tell you, I—do you know, I think a whole lot of you." It was the best he could do, but he kissed her, and that was something—it was a great deal for both of them. Then they relaxed, and talked of the children, about whom she asked a great deal, and of the neighbors, about whom she asked nothing.

The "Comedy Company" had failed, and she was at home to stay. Her absence had made both father and daughter understand how much each was to the other. The little signs of endearment did not vanish as the days wore on. She smoothed his hair when she passed him, and he caught her dress and touched her simply with his hand as she came near him at her work. So much was his heart wrapped up in her that he did not notice the absence of the neighbors from the house, and when he asked them to come, and laughingly upbraided them for their social carelessness, he accepted their explanations with no thought of their insincerity.



"Father and Daughter Met at the Door."

His pride in her knew no conventions [illegible] so [illegible]. Once, when the boys in the shop were eating their noonday lunch in the shade of the building, he looked up from a piece of pie to say in a lull of the conversation, "You fellers may talk all you want to about your purty girls, but I bet I've got one at home 'at 'l beat all yours put together. Some o' you young fellers orto come out an' see her." And when the fellows winked at one another and set up a laugh, the old man laughed, too, and said, "That's what I said; and I did; [illegible] I said it; she's the purtiest [illegible] you ever saw—ef her dad does say so."

He told her [illegible] ing she cried herself to sleep, brooding over her own personal sorrow. She was awakened by her father scraping the ashes from the kitchen stove, and her heart rose to her throat with great love for him. During that entire day the girl held her father in her mind as she went about her household duties. It seemed to her that her life with him was really worth living, and she was glad that since her return she had sent her old companions away. Yet her hand was raised against the world—her narrow world that is the epitome of the great narrow world—because it persecuted her and pointed its finger at the one being she loved. But the very fact that her father was set apart from his fellows because of her drew him close to her. And the night thoughts followed her all through the day, till she longed for his return. It was a good day in her life.

She heard his footsteps on the walk in front, and heard him coming around the house to the kitchen door. When he crossed the threshold she kissed him. The old man was a little abashed at the suddenness of it, but he was pleased. He took a chair and sat in the back yard leaning against the house. From there he talked with her through the open door. They had passed the usual questions of the day, when the old man said, "Allie, y' can't guess what Mrs. Hinkley said about you this evening." The daughter blanched as she stood in the doorway, and said nothing. It was dusk, and the old man did not notice her. "She said, sez she, 'Mr. Beasly, do you know that you are doin' wrong to keep Allie in the house there?' I says, 'Why so, Mrs. Hinkley?' and she wouldn't say nothin' but 'Well, y' are, that's all.' I s'pose Mrs. Hinkley thinks that 'cause you're grown to be so purty an'—an' all that—you're ashamed to stay here in Jersey with your old daddy." Strange things were crowding into the girl's mind—a fearful immastery in her heart. Then the temptation came with her father's question. "But you ain't ashamed to stay with your poor, honest ol' pap, are y', Allie?"

There was a short silence. As it lengthened into a distinct pause the man's heart was shot with fear. He felt remorse wrap him about—remorse and humiliation. He sprang lamely from the leaning chair to his feet and staggered to the door, crying piteously with woe in his voice, "Oh, Allie, Allie—my—my little girl, Allie! We'll move, Allie; we'll move."

He came to her and stood helplessly before her. He could not know why she was dumb. He misunderstood and was turning away in a slow agony of shame, when her love for him swept her as upon a wave into his arms, sobbing.

She recovered quickly, and hastened to a sputtering pan which she pretended needed her attention. The old man touched her dress in his wonted way, as he passed her going toward the door. He hesitated, and seemed to have another protest upon his lips. The daughter felt that she could not keep her sorrow back if he spoke. The old man did not note the pathetic tremble in her voice as she cried to her little sister, playing at the door:

"Jen-nee, Jennie, o-o-h Jennie, you go cut me a switch; I got to tend to your pa. He's makin' me spoil this supper." She added in a lower voice, "The very idea of our movin'!"

And the old man, leaving her with a smile, went into the twilight full of joy.

About ten days ago Cautie lost a $10 bill. He advertised his loss and two days later a man called and delivered to him the bill. Cautie gave the man a reward and thought no more about the incident, except to reflect that mankind was more honest than most people were willing to admit. A few days later he changed suits and in the hip pocket of the other suit found the $10 bill that he had supposed lost.

It seems difficult to draw a moral from this tale, but it undoubtedly must be one in favor of the great American art of advertising.

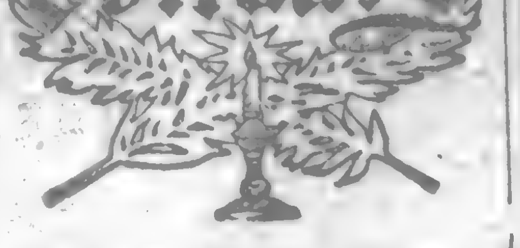
Obituary



When we think of the span of life on this earth in contrast with the age of the earth we see it as a great romance. I know many in this world would not agree with me. But I think the difference is the view we take of life. My view of life is to live life as a thing of value to be contributed and to be contributed too. This is a peculiar way of expressing it, never-the-less it is what I want to say. If we give to the world, it will render it's gift to us.

So we have come to pay our tribute to one that has lived that romance and now passed on to the other side.

Sarah Galbreath was born May 28, 1832. When she grew to young womanhood she was united in marriage to Eli Pritchard One child was born to the young wife. It was about this time she came to DeKalb county. She was married the second time to Jerry Rickett.

The thought of doing for herself was uttermost in her mind and to carry out her scheme for this end she went to Iowa. While here she was united in marriage to Abram Hartman. Following Mr. Hartman's death she came back to Indiana to the home of Mrs. Samuel Fellers, in 1911, and has remained in this vicinity since that return.

We learn that she was a good woman. She was a christian. One can not have a greater thing said about them, than that they are a christian. She united with the Presbyterian church at first. But later changing her fellowship to the Adventist. She was a student of the Bible. She read it through many times. This indicates the worth the Bible was to her and the plan of her life.

She has lived beyond the average years. Not many remain that have close blood ties. Four half sisters live some where in the southern part of the state. She has a number of nephews and nieces. But we realise the mark she leaves behind that tells of her life. This is to be sought above all things. Just to have some one to miss us. She passed to her heavenly home Thursday morning October 26th.

The funeral was held at the house with Rev. C. H. Havens, officiating. Interment was made in Riverside cemetery. E. R. Kinsey, funeral director.

Another Cut In Wages

Hurts the Farmers and Wage Earners

The FORDNEY TARIFF ACT passed by the Republican Congress in September, will INCREASE living costs by billions of dollars a year. Republicans admit that the increase will be three and one-half billions, while Democrats say it will be much more.

$159 PER FAMILY

Taking the Republican estimate as correct, this will be an average of $159 per family for each of the 21 million families in the United States.

Experts figure that the average family with an income of $25 to $35 per week, must spend $159 more per year to live under the Fordney Tariff law than it did under the Democratic law.

These experts on living expenses distribute the increase on necessities of life as follows:

THE COST PER FAMILY

Political economists have figured that it will cost the average family $159 more per year to live under the Fordney Tariff bill than it did under the Democratic Tariff it replaced. The itimized increases are as follows:

Sugar	$ 8 more
Meats, Fresh and cured	16 more
Other food supplies	25 more
Woolen goods	25 more
Cotton goods	30 more
Corsets	2 more
Silk manufactures	20 more
Glassware	2 more
Aluminun articles	2 more
Furniture	8 more
Hardware	4 more
Kitchen utensils	4 more
Window glasses	3 more
Cutlery	4 more
Dishes	5 more
Toys	1 more
	$159 more

No increase is allowed in this table for things the farmer buys, such as fertilizer, implements, wire fences, nails, etc., which will more than replace some of the food and other articles listed above.

Farmers spending more than $1500 a year to live will have an added cost in proportion. The average increase in the cost of living by reason of the Fordney Tariff bill will be easily 10 per cent above present living costs.

Farmers got more for their products and spent less for living under a Democratic tariff than they will under the Fordney law.

Laboring men and salary drawers got higher pay under the Democratic tariff and spent less for living than they will under the Fordney tariff.

The Fordney tariff help only the big profiteers and takes money out the pockets of every workman and farmer.

Vote for the Democratic Candidate for Congress, who will help repeal the law that takes $159 from the purse of every family and gives it to a few profiteers.

Fairfield Beats Branstrator 1000 Votes in Race to Congress

Not more than the ordinary interest existed in the election Thursday in St. Joe. There were about 60 voters who registered failed to come to the polls to vote. Voting was very slow during the forenoon but the boards were busy throughout the afternoon.

To the great surprise of many the township went entirely republican, by a close majority.

The township count on the county ticket went about fifty fifty to the two parties with close margins.

We were not able to obtain the county returns at time to go to press other than the fact that democrats took everything except treasurer. Mrs. Weaver won by 300.

Clarence Paron, the republican candidate, was elected trustee of Newville township. Vere Nelson on the Democratic ticket was elected assessor. The members of the Advisory Board were not made known to us.

Spencer township also went Republican, with the following officers: Trustee, W. O. Lake; Assessor, V. L. Miller; Advisory Board, W. P. Steward, A. W. Beerbower and M. L. Koch; Justice of Peace, M. A. Butler; Constable, D. W. Baughman.

Life of Jack Henderson

J. W. Henderson residing west of Spencerville, was found dead on Wednesday evening about five o'clock on the porch. Mr. Henderson had attended Mr. Pomeroy's funeral at Auburn, in company with his son, William of Antwerp, and upon entering his home dropped dead. The coroner was called and found he had died of apoplexy.

"JACK" J. W. HENDERSON

John W. Henderson, son of William and Matilda (Watson) Henderson, was born near his present residence May 2, 1851. He died November 1, 1922, aged 71 years, 5 months and 8 days.

On July 31, 1872 he was united in marriage to Alice V. Nusbam of Harlan, Allen County, Indiana, and moved to this farm near Spencerville, where he has always resided. To this union four sons were born, Charles and George of Spencerville and William of Antwerp, Ohio. One son died in infancy.

Mr. Henderson was well known in this community where he resided, also throughout the county and his sudden death has cast a gloom over a host of friends and acquaintances.

A truly useful and productive life is one that results in the greatest good to the greatest number. His was such a life, a life of sacrifice and labor for the welfare and happiness of others. In prosperity or adversity, success or defeat he was always the same genial big-hearted, Jack Henderson, with a kind word and a warm hand clasp for all. His stability and strength of character have contributed largely to the welfare of the community where he lived, being progressive and public spirited in the largest sense of the word. He ranked as one of DeKalb County's most representative citizens in all political issues and enterprises of social welfare, yet he retained that unassuming genteel attitude toward all, that made him so much respected by his co-workers.

Politically, Mr. Henderson was affiliated with the republican party and in 1892 was elected Trustee of Concord Township and served in this capacity for five years. In 1904 he was elected Recorder of DeKalb County, discharging the duties of his office for four years to the entire satisfaction of his fellow-citizens.

He united with the M. E. Church at Spencerville in 1884 and was an ardent supporter until his [illegible]

—17—

"Tell him yourself," Gramont laughed, good-humoredly. "Gumberts is coming out day after tomorrow, is he? That'll be Friday. Hm! I think that I'd better bring Fell out here the same day, if I can make it. I probably won't see Gumberts until then—I'm not working in with him and he doesn't know me yet—but I'll try and get out here on Friday with Fell. Now, I'll have to beat it in a hurry. Any message to send?"

"Not me," was the answer.

Gramont scarcely knew how he departed, until he found himself scrambling back through the underbrush of the Ledanois place.

He rushed into the house, found the fire had died down beyond all danger, and swiftly removed the few things they had taken from the car. Carrying these, he stumbled back to where he had hidden the automobile. He scarcely dared to think, scarcely dared to congratulate himself on the luck that had befallen him, until he found himself in his own car once more, and with open throttle sweeping out through the twilight toward Paradis and Houma beyond. A whirlwind of mad exultation was seething within him—exultation as sudden and tremendous as the past weeks had been uneventful and dragging.

Gramont, in common with many others, had heard much indefinite rumor of an underground lottery game that was being worked among the negroes of the state and the Chinese villages along the gulf coast. And now he knew definitely.

Lotteries have never died out in Louisiana since the brave old days of the government-ordained gambles, laws and ordinances to the contrary. No laws can make the yellow man and the black man forego the get-rich-quick heritage of their fathers. On the Pacific coast lotteries obtain and will obtain wherever there is a Chinatown. In Louisiana the days of the grand lottery have never been forgotten. The last two years of high wages had made every negro wealthy, comparatively speaking. The lottery mongers would naturally find them a ripe harvest for the picking. And who would gravitate to this harvest field if not the great Gumberts, the uncaught Memphis Izzy, the promoter who had never been "mugged!"

Here, at one stroke, stumbling on the thing by sheer blind accident, Gramont had located the nucleus of the whole business!

Gradually his brain cooled to the realization of what work lay before him. He was through Paradis almost without seeing the town, and switched on his lights as he took the highway to Houma. Sober reflection seized him. Not only was this crowd of crooks working a lottery, but they were also managing a stupendous thievery of automobiles, in which cars were looted by wholesale! And the man at the head of it all, the man above Memphis Izzy and his crooks, was Jachin Fell of New Orleans.

Did Lucie Ledanois dream such a thing? No! Gramont dismissed the question at once. Fell was not an unusual type of man. There were many Jachin Fells throughout the country, he reflected. Men who applied their brains to crooked work, who kept themselves above any actual share in the work, and who profited hugely by tribute money from every crook in every crime.

To the communities in which they lived such men were patterns of all that wealthy gentlemen should be. Seldom, except perhaps in gossip of the underworld, was their connection with crime ever suspected. And—this thought was sobering to Gramont—never did they come within danger of retribution at the hands of the law. Their ramifications extended too far into politics, and the governors of some Southern states have unlimited powers of pardon.

"This is a big day!" reflected Gramont, dismissing the sinister suggestion of this last thought. "A big day! What it will lead to, I don't know. Not the least of it is the financial end of it—the oil seepage! That little iridescent trickle of oil on the water means that money worries are over, both for me and for Lucie. I'm sorry that I am mixed up with Fell; I've enough money of my own to drill at least one good well, and one is all we'll need to bring in oil on that place. Well, we'll see what turns up! My first job is to make sure Hammond is safe, and to relieve his mind. I'll have to leave him in jail, I suppose—"

Why did Fell want to "get something" on Hammond? To this there was no answer.

He drove to Houma to find the town abuzz with excitement, for the news of the sheriff's murder had stirred the place wildly. Proceeding straight to the courthouse, Gramont encountered Ben Chacherre as he was leaving the car.

[illegible]

No danger of his getting lynched, I hope?"

"Not a chance," said the other, conclusively. "Six deputies up there now, and quite a bunch of ex-soldiers comin' to stand guard. You goin' to fight the case?"

"No," said Gramont. "Can't fight a sure thing, can you? I'm sorry for him, though."

Chacherre shrugged his shoulders and got into the car.

Gramont was much relieved to find that there was no danger of lynching, which had been his one fear. It was with much persuasion that he got past the guard and into the courthouse, where he was received by a number of deputies in charge of the situation.

After conferring with them at some length, he was grudgingly taken to the cell occupied by Hammond. The latter received him with a wide grin, and gave no signs of the grueling ordeal through which he had passed.

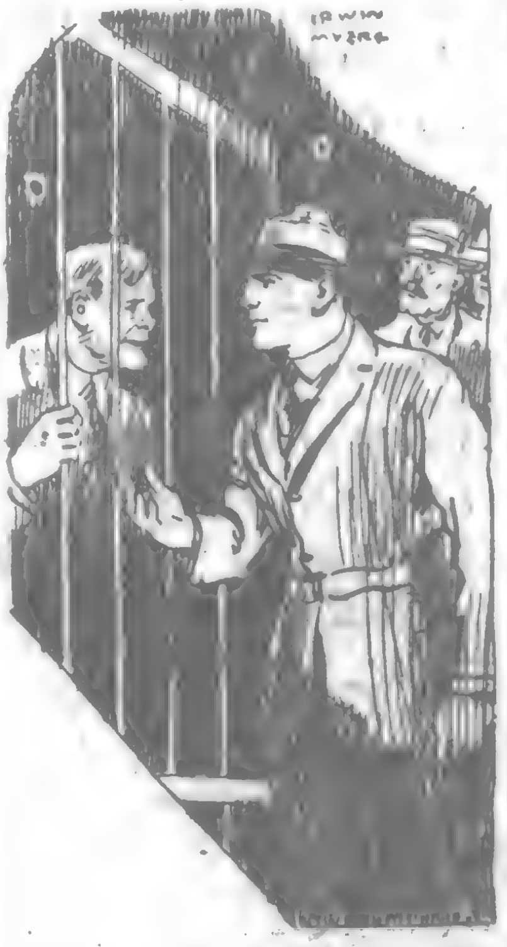
"Listen, old man," said Gramont, earnestly. "Will you play out the game hard to the end? I'll have to leave you here for two days. At the end of that time you'll be free."

The listening deputies sniffed, but Hammond merely grinned again and put a hand through the bars.

"Whatever you say, cap'n," he rejoined. "It sure looks bad—"

"Don't you think it," said Gramont, cheerfully. "A lot of things have happened since I saw you last! I've got the real murderer right where I want him—but I can't have him arrested yet."

"It's a gang," said Hammond. "You watch out, cap'n, I heard 'em say somethin' about Memphis Izzy—remember the guy I told you about one day? Well, this is no piker's game! We're up against somethin' solid—"



"Will You Play Out the Game Hard to the End?"

"I know it," and Gramont nodded. He turned to the deputies. "Gentleman, you have my address if you wish to communicate with me. I shall be back here day after tomorrow—at least, before midnight of that day. I warn you, that if anything happens to this man in the meantime, you shall be held personally responsible. He is innocent."

"Looks like we'd better hold you, too," said one of the men. "You seem to know a lot!"

Gramont looked at him a moment.

"I know enough to tell you where to head in if you try any funny work here," he said, evenly. "Gentlemen, thank you for permitting the interview! I'll see you later."

The coroner's jury had already adjudged Hammond guilty of the murder. Returning to the car, Gramont had Ben Chacherre drive to a restaurant, where they got a bite to eat. Twenty minutes later they were on their way to New Orleans—and Gramont learned for the first time of Joseph Maillard's murder by the Midnight Masquer, and of the arrest of Bob Maillard for the crime.

CHAPTER XII

The Ultimatum.

Upon the following morning Gramont called both Jachin Fell and Lucie Ledanois over the telephone. He acquainted them briefly with the result of his oil investigation, and arranged a meeting for ten o'clock, at Fell's office.

It was slightly before ten when Gramont called with the car for Lucie. Under the spell of her smiling eagerness, [illegible] own folly now. If this affair were to be laid at my door, some kind of a case might be made up against me, and it would seem plausible. But, fortunately, I was out of it in time. Were we merely characters in a standardized detective story, I suppose I'd be arrested and deluged with suspense and clues and so forth."

"Your escape was too narrow to joke over, Henry," she reproved him, gravely.

"I'm not joking, my dear Lucie. I learned nothing about the tragedy until late last night. From what I can find in the papers, it seems agreed that Bob was not the real Masquer, but had assumed that guise for a joke. A tragic joke! Since he was undoubtedly drunk at the time, his story can't be relied upon as very convincing. And yet, it's frightfully hard to believe that, even by accident, a son should have shot down his own father—"

"Don't!" Lucie winced a little. "In spite of all the evidence against him, in spite of the way he was found with that aviation uniform, it's still awful to believe. I can't realize that it has actually happened."

"According to the papers, poor Mrs. Maillard has gone to pieces. No wonder."

"Yes. I was there with her all day yesterday, and shall go again today. They say Bob is terribly broken up. He sent for his mother, and she refused to see him. I don't know how it is all going to end! Do you think his story might be true—that somebody else might have acted as the Masquer that night?"

Gramont shook his head.

"It's possible," he said, reluctantly, "yet it hardly seems very probable. And now, Lucie, I'm very sorry indeed to say it—but you must prepare yourself against another shock in the near future."

"What do you mean? About the oil—"

"No. It's too long a story to tell you now; here we are at the Maison Blanche. Just remember my words, please. It's something that I can't go into now."

"Very well, Henry! Do you think that it's possible your chauffeur, Hammond, could have learned about the drinking party, and could have—"

Gramont started. "Hammond? No. I'll answer for him beyond any question, Lucie. By the way, does Fell know anything about Hammond having been the first Masquer?"

"Not from me," said the girl, watching him.

"Very well. Hammond got into a bit of trouble at Houma, and I had to leave him there. It was none of his fault, and he'll get out of it all right. Well, come along up to our oil meeting! Forget your troubles, and don't let my croakings about a new shock cause you any worry just yet."

He was thinking of Jachin Fell, and the girl's closeness to Fell. Had he not known that Fell was responsible for Hammond's being in jail, he might have felt differently. As it was, he was now forewarned and forearmed, although he could not see what animus Fell could possibly have against Hammond.

It was lucky, he reflected grimly, that he had never breathed to a soul except Lucie the fact that Hammond had been the first Masquer! Had Fell known this fact, his desire to lay Hammond by the heels might have been easily fulfilled—and Hammond would probably have found himself charged with Maillard's murder.

They found Jachin Fell dictating to a stenographer. He greeted them warmly, ushering them at once into his private office.

Gramont found it difficult to convince himself that his experiences of the previous afternoon had been real. It was almost impossible to believe that this shy, apologetic little man in gray was in reality the "man higher up!" Yet he knew it to be the case—knew it beyond any escape.

"By the way," and Fell turned to Gramont, "if you'll dictate a brief statement concerning that oil seepage, I'd be obliged! Merely give the facts. I may have need of such a statement from you."

Gramont nodded and joined the stenographer in the outer office, where he dictated a brief statement. It did not occur to him that there might be danger in this; at the moment, he was rather off his guard. He was thinking so much about his future assault on Fell that he quite ignored the possibility of being placed on the defensive.

Within five minutes he had returned to Lucie and Jachin Fell, who were discussing the condition of Mrs. Maillard. Gramont signed the statement and handed it to Fell, who laid it with other papers at his elbow.

"I suppose we may proceed to business?" began Fell. "I have drawn up articles of partnership; we can apply for incorporation later if we so desire. Lucie, both Henry Gramont and I are putting twenty-five thousand dollars into this company, [illegible]

LOW RATE ON ROAD MATERIAL

Shipment of Surplus War Articles Permitted by Ruling as "Contractor's Equipment."

In the shipment of surplus war materials transferred to them by the bureau of public roads, United States Department of Agriculture, state highway departments will be saved a great deal of expense as a result of a ruling of the Interstate Commerce commission permitting the shipment of this material as "contractor's equipment," thereby giving it the advantage of a low rate.

The railroads previously required the states to pay less-than-carload rates on the various items included in such shipments, even when together they made up a carload. The contention of the bureau is that since the bulk of this material has been used and none of it is new, and since it is all intended for use in road construction, it should be given the advantage of the low rate allowed to contractor's equipment. This contention, which was opposed by the railroads, was upheld by the Interstate Commerce commission.

Unloading Road-Building Material by Use of Lavor-Saving Device.

The low rate is now applicable to some 1,200 carloads to be shipped from Camp Grant, Ill., and large quantities from other points. On a carload shipment from Schenectady, N. Y., to Boise, Ida., $720 recently was saved, and $500 on another from San Antonio, Tex., to Salem, Ore.

DISCUSS BUILDING PROBLEMS

Standardization of Specifications and Tests for Road Materials Are Being Made.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The committee on tests of the American Society of State Highway Officials met with the officials of the bureau of public roads of the United States Department of Agriculture, in Washington, to consider standardization of specifications and tests for road materials. The purpose of this meeting of representatives from all sections of the country was not so much to lay down rigid rules as to harmonize the general practice. Standardization taking into account local conditions is being brought about by a series of meetings between officials from groups of states and engineers of the bureau.

The present activity of highway officials along this line is most encouraging for road building. A few years ago the general tendency was toward individuality in each state, without much opportunity for exchange of ideas and knowledge. Today the tendency is in the other direction, and a better solution should be reached when the problems are discussed at meetings of the best highway engineering talent of the country.

ROAD SAFETY LAWS FAVORED

Highway Accidents Could Be Greatly Decreased by Requiring Mirror on Trucks.

Accidents on the highways, according to M. V. Eldridge, road director of the American Automobile association, could be greatly decreased by the passage of uniform state laws requiring every truck to carry a mirror giving a view of the road to the rear and by requiring every horse-drawn vehicle to display some sort of light when using the roads at night.

Mr. Eldridge states that 12 states and the District of Columbia have laws requiring the mirror on trucks, but that few have any legislation for horse-drawn vehicles. The states requiring [illegible]

GOLDEN TEXT—As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.—Luke 6:31.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Matt. 5:1-18; John 3:2; 6:68; 7:46; Col. 2:3.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Teaching Us to Love Everybody.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Living by the Golden Rule.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Golden Rule in Everyday Life.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus Teaching Us How to Live Together.

I. Characteristics of the Subjects of the Kingdom (vv. 20-26).

Only those who are subjects of the Kingdom know what blessedness is. The spiritual experience of the subjects of the Kingdom are marked by the following steps:

1. Poverty of Spirit (v. 20). This means consciousness of one's lost condition and worthlessness. It is spiritual bankruptcy. It means to come to the end of self and to show sorrow for sins.

2. Hunger for Righteousness (v. 21). The one who has come to know his poverty desires the true righteousness of Christ.

3. Weeping Because of His Lack (v. 21). This is the godly sorrow which worketh repentance (II Cor. 7:10). Those who thus sorrow are assured that they shall laugh.

4. Treatment Which the Subjects of the Kingdom May Expect (vv. 22, 23). When the subjects of the Kingdom become like the King they incite the hatred, contempt and persecution of the world. Those who pass through this for Christ's sake should rejoice, for there is great reward laid up for them.

II. The Governing Principles of the Kingdom (vv. 27-38).

1. Love Your Enemies (v. 27). To love friends is easy, but to love enemies is only possible to those who have been made partakers of the divine nature.

2. Do Good to Those Who Hate You (v. 27). Love acts according to its own nature. Enmity only stimulates love to act in harmony with its own laws.

3. Bless Them That Curse You (v. 28). Injury by words is hard to let go unchallenged.

4. Pray for Them Which Despitefully Use You (v. 28). Christ's own example is the best commentary on this precept (Luke 23:24; cf. Acts 7:60).

5. Patiently Endure Wrong and Injury (v. 29). The Christian is not to bristle up in defense of his rights, but rather to suffer insult, injury and even loss. This should not be pressed so far that evildoers can go unchecked. It expresses the law which should govern individual action.

6. Give to Every One That Asketh (v. 30). This does not necessarily mean that the thing asked for should be given. We should give to every one that asketh, but not necessarily the thing asked for.

7. Do as You Wish to Be Done By (v. 31). This is called the 'Golden Rule." If men were to live by this rule the labor problem would be solved. An end would be put to war. International relations would be peacefully adjusted and all profiteering in business would end.

8. Be Merciful (v. 36). The mercy of the Heavenly Father is the grand example.

9. Censorious Judgment Condemned (v. 37). We should not seek out the evil in others for our satisfaction.

10. Danger of Following False Teachers (v. 39). The one who does not know God and the way to heaven will lead others to ruin. Happily, we have the Scriptures, and the Holy Spirit is ready to make their meaning known, so there is no excuse.

11. Those Who Reprove Others Should Strive to Live Blameless Lives (vv. 31-46). It is easy to see others' faults, but hard to see our own.

12. The Sin of Profession Without Fruits (v. 46). The one who professes a life and fellowship with God should practice the principles which reveal the nature of God.

III. The Judgment to Be Applied to the Subjects of the Kingdom (vv. 47-49).

1. The one who hears and does the sayings of Christ the King shall be as secure as the house built upon the solid rock. The storms of the judgment cannot destroy him, for the Rock of Ages is immovable.

2. The one who hears and does not the sayings of Christ shall be overwhelmed in the judgment and go down to utter ruin and destruction.

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

BY MARY GRAHAM BONNER

COPYRIGHT BY WESTERN NEWSPAPER UNION

PORCUPINE PARTY

The hairy badger from South Africa had had his dinner. Then he had had a delightful bath or spray from the hose. The keeper had given him this and he had enjoyed it even more than the visitors who had looked on.

The hairy badger thought he was very polite to let such a lot of people watch him having his bath. Yes, he thought he was most obliging.

The white-nosed coati-mundi from South America was having a beautiful time talking in his own grunting fashion to one of the visitors who had come to the zoo.

He had had a nice dinner and was feeling particularly well.

He had had a little chopped beef too with the rest of his dinner.

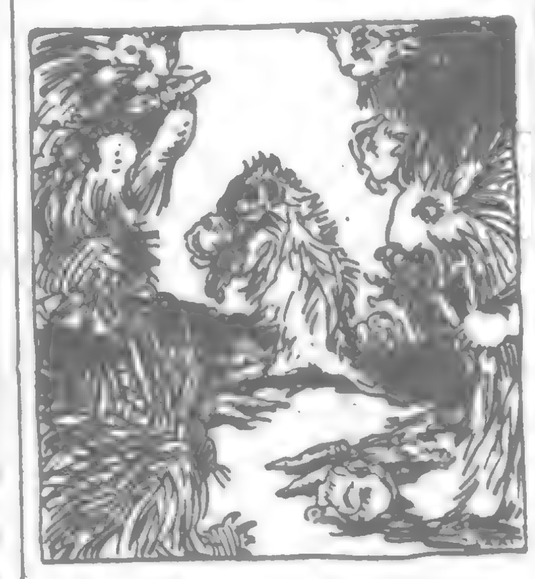
And it was nice to be a great pet. Oh yes, that was particularly nice.

The striped tailed dog and the white throated sapajou were together as they always were. The white throated sapajou looks exactly like a monkey and is a little animal from South America.

The sapajou is just like a monkey in all his looks.

The sapajou had had his dinner and he had had a little meat, for he was quite fond of that. Everything he had had he had put first in his pan of water in much the way the raccoon family will wash all their food.

Now the sapajou and the striped-tailed dog had become great friends.



"A Splendid Feast."

No one knew just why. But the best of friends they were.

And so they lived together in their zoo home as they had always been together since they had first seen each other.

How happy they were together, too! Only it puzzled people to see the sapajou and the dog in a little zoo home side by side.

The sapajou was much interested in the visitors and sat up close so he could see them all and his little eyes looked so amused and as though he were enjoying himself so much.

He grinned at the keeper every time the keeper went by and the keeper would speak to him and the sapajou would look much pleased.

The striped-tailed dog, too, had come from South America. And as the sapajou watched the people he said to himself, "This is a wonderful show—seeing all the people pass along.

"And gracious me, how many children there are! Well, I must say I find grown-ups and children very amusing to watch. Yes, they cheer me up—altogether I really am always very cheerful. But they make me feel so jolly and so amused."

Now, while all these animals were enjoying themselves in their various ways the four yellow-haired porcupines were having a party.

And they were not paying a scrap of attention to the visitors. They sat in a circle with their backs turned to the people.

In the very center of the circle was a little baby porcupine. And a more cunning little creature you never could see, I'm sure!

He was very small—not so very much bigger than a guinea pig and yet his parents were such enormously big porcupines.

All of the four porcupines were very, very large.

The little one was sitting up too, just the way they all did and he was nibbling at lettuce and carrots and eating very grown-up food for a little fellow only two weeks old.

For that was all he was. His parents had been born in Alaska and his uncle and aunt had been born in the United States but he had been born in the zoo and he found it was very nice.

A little porcupine is like a little guinea pig in the way it can eat anything right away.

There was a splendid feast for the porcupines and some of them were finishing off with a dessert of bread which many of the animals like as a dessert.

Oh, yes, it was a real porcupine party but the one who felt like the guest of honor was the dear little baby porcupine with his [illegible] little [illegible] and his [illegible] at [illegible].

'PEP' IN SCHOOL PLAYGROUND

Authority Makes Plea for Games That Are Characterized by Energy and Vim.

"Jellyfish gymnastics, or stupid, silly games, played half-heartedly, have little place in the proper physical development of the growing child," declares Dr. E. Blanche Sterling, acting assistant surgeon, United States public health service, in commenting on the health of school children. In planning exercise with a view to the promotion of good posture, she suggests they should be simple and vigorous and full of energy and vim.

The posture of school children cannot, however, be said to depend chiefly on any one condition, she holds. Defective vision, adenoids and bad tonsils tend to have a bad effect on the child's posture. Where hygienic conditions in a school are not the best there is an increase of poor posture. Good nutrition is a contributing factor to good posture, but by no means an indispensable condition. Condition of the teeth, she claims, has no effect. Doctor Sterling's findings are based on a study of three elementary schools at Bedford, Ind.

A million dollars' reward will never bring back lost time.

PROBABLY DIDN'T GET LOAN

Would-Be Borrower Freed His Mind, but Remark Poured No Oil on Troubled Waters.

The story is told of a banker who suffered the loss of one eye and had a glass substitute made. The glass eye was wonderfully fashioned, so much so that the wearer was satisfied no one could tell it from a real organ. A day or so after he began wearing it a customer of the bank sought a loan, but the banker was not quite satisfied with the collateral. After much persuasion from the would-be borrower, the banker said:

"I will make you a sporting proposition. If you can tell which of my eyes is glass, I will make you the loan."

"That's easy," replied the other. "It's your left eye."

"How do you know?" asked the banker.

"It is the more sympathetic of the two," responded the borrower.—Wall Street Journal.

Ed Miser Gives Account of Western Trip

We left St. Joe Monday at 1:30 p. m. and our train being five hours late did not arrive at Sapulpa until Wednesday at 2 p. m.

Here we were met by our brother and taken overland 35 miles to Drumright. This is a very thrifty little city being about 10 or 12 years old, about 8,000 inhabitants and is the center of the oil industry, there being about 25 or 50 oil wells inside the city limits and hundreds outside. The old ones being operated by gasoline engines and the new ones by electricity and you can hear the chug, chug of the engines at all times, day or night, some pumping 24 hours a day and others as low as two. The natural gas which forms around the inside of the casing of an oil well is condensed from a vapor to a liquid, this being blended with kerosene and naptha makes a very poor grade of gasoline, they call this process the manufacture of gasoline the price being two or three cents higher than it is here as is always the case outside of the jurisdiction of the Standard Oil of Indiana. There are also a great number of large tank farms which include 40 or 50 large storage tanks holding from 55,000 to 85,000 barrels of crude oil, which is pumped from there to the refineries by pipe lines as needed.

The land is very broken and hilly and the soil is of a brick dust color, but the climate is fine, while all the crops that can be raised are cotton and kafir corn the summers being so hot and dry that other crops burn out. There are a great number of rivers, most of them being perfectly dry and many of them have oil wells in the middle of them.

We visited the Indian agency at Pawnee, an Indian town of about 2,000 and the county seat of Pawnee county. This agency being handled through the interior department at Washington and is a sort of a guardian for the Indians giving them their monthly allowances and telling them what they are allowed to buy. The Indian likes bright red automobiles and Mexican bootleg firewater, but does not talk very much. We passed an Indian picture show and the sign in rude hand writing read "kids 5c, big folks 10c." This town is the home of Pawnee Bill, the founder of the Pawnee Bill Wild West Shows. He is now engaged in the buffalo business. We saw 125 buffalos running loose on his ranch.

We also witnessed the Ku Klux Klan parade at this place of several hundred men dressed in their ghostly regalia, headed by a huge fiery cross, this organization being very strong in that locality.

Here we also saw what the cowboys call a "round up" which is sort of an event like our county fairs lasting from three days to a week, [illegible]

[illegible] with one of the large oil concerns. Both send their best regards to all their friends here.

We had a much nicer trip home, coming by way of St. Louis and Chicago riding mostly in day time and making better connections.

We arrived home on B. & O. No. 6, glad to get back to St. Joe and home safe again.

Hallowe'en Parties

The St. Joe Choral Society was delightfully entertained at the home of Merritt Sechler, Tuesday evening, at a prettily appointed Hallowe'en party. Approximately twenty members of the society met at the homes of Mrs. Charles Rice and Mrs. Ed. Leichty and were carried to the scene of the party on a hay wagon.

Goblins and witches were waiting to give the masked guests a taste of spirit life in a dark room filled with witch mysteries. After a social time was enjoyed, delicious refreshments were served. Hallowe'en favors and decorations of bitter-sweet, jack-o-lanterns and corn stalks added in making a charming setting for the occasion.

The pleasant country home of Mr. and Mrs. Will Hamilton was the scene of much merriment on Friday evening, October 27, when at the hour of eight the R. H. C. and their guests arrived.

A ghost greeted them at the entrance of the lawn. A sign on a tree near pointed the line of detour. They followed the clothes line trail and kept their eyes on the wind mill and thus found the outside entrance to the cellar, where, amid all kinds of weird surroundings, a ghost threw a flash light in the direction of the steps, where the witches swept our backs and we were permitted to land on the first floor.

This room was in charge of masked figures who presented orange caps to the ladies and black caps to the men, which were worn throughout the evening. The rooms were prettily decorated with orange and black crepe paper, black cats, bats, jack o' lanterns, and Japanese lanterns.

The costumes were variable and unique. There were darkies, witches, Indian maidens, ghosts, beautiful ladies, and little boys. One of the party brought forth screams of laughter, disguised as a beautiful(?) blushing maiden carrying a bride's bouquet of yellow marigolds.

The program consisted of music, contests, jokes, stories and one act dramas. Napkins pinned on a line with clothes pin dolls dressed in orange and black were passed as favors. Delicious refreshments were served consisting of doughnuts passed on the witches' broom stick, pumpkin pie with whipped cream and nuts, waldorf salad, and postum topped with marshmallows.

Flash light pictures were taken. All went home feeling they had spent a very enjoyable evening and one they would remember for many moons to come. ber ofr mnay moons to come.

James R. Smith Ends Own Life

Burried Here Monday

Placing the barrel of a shotgun against his breast, James R. Smith, a bachelor of 63 years, formerly of St. Joe, now of Garrett, Sunday afternoon pushed the trigger with the ramrod and thus brought an end to his career.

Mr. Smith had gone into the woodshed on the farm owned by himself and his nephew, Don E. Van Fleit, two miles south of Garrett in Butler township, to commit the deed. The charge entered the left side of his breast over the heart. Death no doubt was instantaneous.

Mr. Smith had been afflicted with heart trouble for the past three years. This together with the fact that he did not like to have his sister leave for Florida, made him dispondent, and prompted to the act that took his life.

The funeral was held at Garrett, Monday and the body was burried in the Riverside Cemetry at St. Joe.

Two Weeks Meetings

Rev. S. D. Steffey is conducting a two weeks meeting in the local Lutheran Church, beginning with last Sunday evening. Each meeting will begin promptly at seven o'clock. The pastor is very much pleased with the attendance so far but feels that it will increase night by night. His programs differ and are all very inteseeting. Everyone is invited to attend.

American Farm Bureau

W. R. Giles of Kimbolton Taking Home Improved Trumbull Seed Wheat.

Improvement of varieties of wheat grown by their members is a project of a number of county farm bureaus in Ohio. The standardization on a small number of these varieties which have proved superior in both yield and milling qualities, is also urged.

Working Together.

The Ohio Seed Improvement association and the Ohio Farm Bureau federation are working together in the increased production of improved wheats and in their marketing. A large number of counties were successful in increasing the acreage of improved varieties last year, and a number of counties have introduced them this fall. Reports now being compiled show a considerable increase in yield per acre of the improved varieties over common wheats in the state this year.

The two organizations have been of assistance, both in the marketing of the certified seed, and in sales of the improved varieties that did not qualify for certification for seed purposes. Mills in many sections of the state have aided in the wider distribution of better wheats. About three carloads have been distributed through mills in Athens county. Two mills in Ashtabula county have distributed about 22,000 bushels of improved seed.

The picture shows W. R. Giles of Guernsey county taking home his portion of the 2,500 bushels of Trumbull seed wheat brought into the county by the farm bureau. The seed was obtained from growers of Marion and Holmes counties.

Plans for a state co-operative pure-seed exchange are now being developed by the Ohio Farm Bureau federation.

AGRICULTURAL EVILS MENDED BY CONGRESS

Farm Bloc Given Credit for Great Amount of Legislation Favoring American Farmer.

The last congress, which closed in September, was a farm congress. That is, it passed more legislation of benefit to the farmers of the United States than possibly any preceding session.

Newspapers and men who watch proceedings at the nation's capitol say that the farm bloc is responsible for this amount of agricultural legislation. But in these statements the authors make it plain that emergency rather that sheer class legislation is the cause.

Commenting on the new tariff law and the farm bloc's part in representing the farmers of America in this legislation, Gray Silver, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau federation, says: "Agriculture has obtained duties on almost every commodity on which it desired a tariff, and the rates are in most instances as high as was requested."

The American Farm Bureau federation during the past session of congress interested itself in some 80 bills of great importance to American farmers. Many bills backed by the federation are now laws. The present congress has passed more legislation correcting agricultural evils than has any other congress in history. Congress required considerable help and not a little prodding. The farm bureau furnished both and got satisfactory results.

The farm bloc backed the following measures:

Agricultural Credit act, extending life of War Finance corporation and many farm loans.

Bill legalizing co-operative marketing. Removed legal uncertainties hampering co-operative marketing.

Bill regulating packers and stockyards. Producers' interests now protected.

Federal farm-to-markets road program.

Bill providing funds for tuberculosis eradication.

Put farmer on federal reserve board, to protect farmers' interests.

Kept United States Department of Agriculture appropriation at efficiency point.

OHIO BUYING FEEDER STOCK

Orders for Cattle From Western Ranges Have Been Received From Thirteen Counties.

Orders for more than 2,000 head of feeder cattle to be purchased on the western ranges and shipped directly to Ohio feedlots have been received at the office of the Ohio Farm Bureau federation. Orders for these feeder cattle to be co-operatively purchased through western state farm bureau federations are already reported from 13 counties.

The Story of Aqua Pura

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

PEOPLE who write about Kansas, as a rule, write ignorantly, and speak of the state as a finished product. Kansas, like Gaul of old, is divided into three parts, differing as widely, each from the other, as any three countries in the same latitude upon the globe. It would be as untrue to classify together the Egyptian, the Indian and the Central American, as to speak of the Kansas man without distinguishing between the eastern Kansan, the central Kansan, and the western Kansan. Eastern Kansas is a finished community like New York or Pennsylvania. Central Kansas is finished, but not quite paid for; and western Kansas, the only place where there is any suffering from drought or crop failures, is a new country—old only in a pluck which is slowly conquering the desert.

Aqua Pura was a western Kansas town, set high up, far out on the prairie. It was founded nine years ago, at the beginning of the boom, not by cowboys and ruffians, but by honest, ambitious men and women. Of the six men who staked out the town site, two—Johnson and Barringer—were Harvard men; one, Nickols, was from Princeton; and the other three, Bemis, Bradley and Hicks, had come from inland state universities. When their wives came West there was a Vassar reunion, and the first mail that arrived after the post office had been established brought the New York magazines. The town was like dozens of others that sprang up far out in the treacherous wilderness in that fresh, green spring of 1886.

They called it Aqua Pura, choosing a Latin name to proclaim to the world that it was not a rowdy town. The new yellow pine of the little village gleamed in the clear sunlight. It could be seen for miles on a clear, warm day, as it stood upon a rise of ground; and over in Maize, six miles away, the electric lights of Aqua Pura, which flashed out in the evening before the town was six months old, could be seen distinctly. A schoolhouse that cost twenty thousand dollars was built before the town had seen its first winter; and the first Christmas ball in Aqua Pura was held in an opera house that cost ten thousand. Money was plentiful; two and three-story buildings rose on each side of the main street of the little place. The farmers who had taken homesteads in the country around the town had prospered.

Barringer was elected mayor at the municipal election in the spring of '87, and he platted out Barringer's Addition, and built a house there with borrowed money in June. There were two thousand people in Aqua Pura then.

There was not a lawless element. There was not a saloon in the town. A billiard hall, and a dark room, wherein cards might be played surreptitiously, were the only institutions which made the people of Aqua Pura blush, when they took the innumerable "Eastern capitalists" over the town who visited western Kansas that year. These "capitalists" were entertained at a three-story brick hotel, equipped with electricity and modern plumbing in order to excel Maize, where the hotel was an indifferent frame affair.

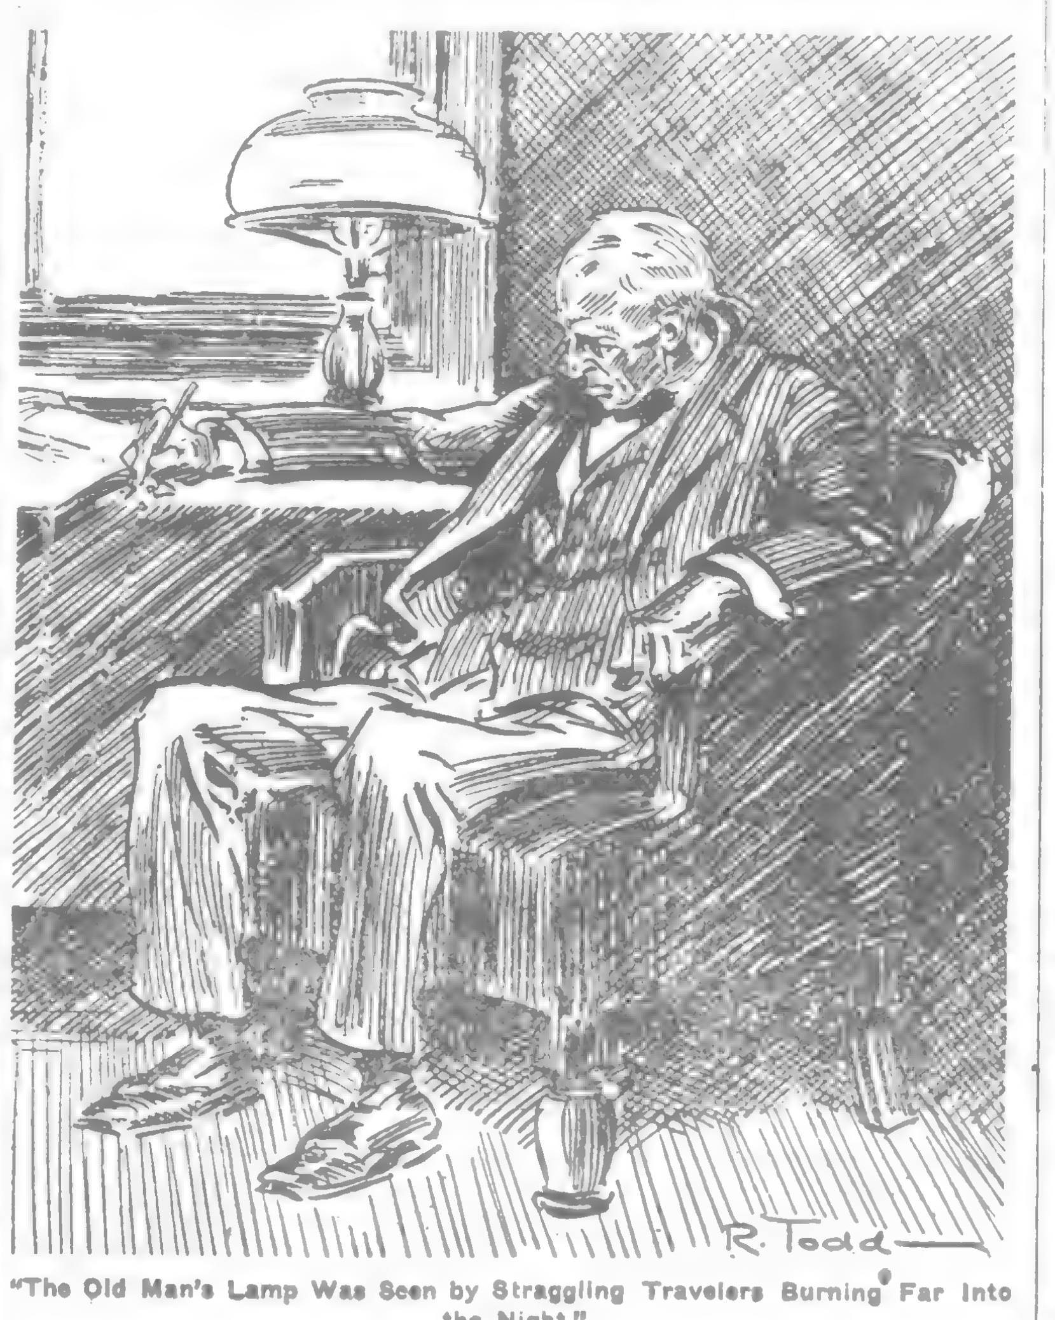
This is the story of the rise. Barringer has told it a thousand times. Barringer believed in the town to the last. When the terrible drought of 1887, with its furnacelike breath singed the town and the farms in Fountain county, Barringer led the majority which proudly claimed that the country was all right; and as chairman of the board of county commissioners, he sent a scathing message to the governor, refusing aid. Barringer's own bank loaned money on land, whereon the crop had failed, to tide the farmers over the winter. Barringer's signature guaranteed loans from the East upon everything negotiable, and Aqua Pura thrived for a time upon promises. Here and there, in the spring of 1888, there was an empty building. One room of the opera house block was vacant. Barringer started a man in business, selling notions, who occupied the room. Barringer went East and pleaded with the men who had invested in the town to be easy on their debtors. Then came the hot winds of July, blowing out of the southwest, scorching the grass, shriveling the grain, and drying up the streams that had filled in the spring. During the fall of that year the hotel, which had been open only in the lower story, closed. The opera house began to be used for "aid" meetings, and when the winter wind blew dust-blackened snow through the desolate streets of the little town, it rattled a hundred windows in vacant houses, and sometimes blew sun-warped boards from the high sidewalk that led across the gully to the big red grade of the unfinished "Chicago Air Line."

Barringer did not go East that year. He could not. But he wrote—wrote regularly and bravely to the Eastern capitalists who were concerned in his bank and loan company; and they grew colder and colder as the winter deepened and the interest on defaulted loans came out. Barringer's failure was announced in the spring of '89. Nickols had left. Johnson had left. The other founders of Aqua Pura had died in '87-88, and their families had gone, and with them the culture and the ambition of the town. But Barringer held on and lived, rent free, in the two front rooms of the barn of a hotel. His daughter, Mary, frail, tanned, hollow-eyed and withered by the droughts lived with him.

In 1890 the hot winds came again in the summer and long and steady they blew, blighting everything. There were only five hundred people in Fountain county that year, and they lived on the taxes from the railroad that crossed the county. Families were put on the poor list without disgrace—it was almost a mark of political distinction—and in the little town many devices were in vogue to distribute the county funds during the winter.

There was no rain that winter and the snow was hard and dry. Cattle on the range suffered for water and died by the thousands. A procession from the little town started eastward early in the spring. White-canopied wagons, sought the rising sun.

Christmas eve, 1891, the entire village, fifteen souls in all, assembled at Barringer's house. He was hopeful, even cheerful, and talked bitterly of what "one good crop" would do for the country; although there were no farmers left to plant it, even if nature had been harboring a smile for the dreary land. The year that followed that Christmas promised much. There were spring rains, and in May the brown grass and the scattered patches of wheat grew green and fair to see. Barringer freshened up perceptibly. He sent an account of his indebtedness—on home-ruled manilla paper—to his creditors in the East, and faithfully assured them that he would remit all he owed in the fall. A few wanderers straggled into Fountain county, lured by the green fields and running brooks. The gray prairie wolf gave up the dug-out to human occupants. Lights in the prairie cabins twinkled back hope to the stars. Before June there were a thousand people in Fountain county. Aqua Pura's business houses seemed to liven up. There was a Fourth of July celebration in town. But the rain that spoiled the advertised "fireworks in the evening" was the last that fell until winter. A carload of aid from central Kansas saved a hundred lives in Fountain county that year.



"The Old Man's Lamp Was Seen by Straggling Travelers Burning Far Into the Night."

When the spring of 1893 opened, Barringer looked ten years older than he looked the spring before.

It was his habit to sit on the front porch of the deserted hotel and look across the prairies to the southwest and watch the breaking clouds scatter into the blue of the twilight. He could see the empty water tower silhouetted against sky. The frame buildings that rose in the boom days had all been moved away. He sat and waited, hoping fondly for the realization of a dream which he feared could never come true.

There were days when the postmaster's four-year-old child sat with him. The old man and the child sat thus one evening when the old man sighed: "If it would only rain, there would be half a crop yet! If it would only rain!" The child heard him and sighed imitatively: "Yes, if it would only rain—what is rain, Mr. Barringer?" He looked at the child blankly and sat for a long time in silence. When he arose he did not even have a pretense of hope. He grew despondent from that hour, and a sort of hypochondria seized him.

That fall when the winds piled the sand in the railroad "cuts" and the prairie was as hard and barren as the ground around a cabin door, Barringer's daughter died of fever. The old man seemed little moved by sorrow.

That winter the postmaster left. The office was discontinued. The county commissioners tried to get Barringer to leave. He would not be persuaded to go. The county commissioners were not insistent. It gave one of them an excuse for drawing four dollars a day from the county treasury; he rode from Maize to Aqua Pura every day with supplies for Barringer.

The old man cooked, ate, and slept in the office of the hotel. Day after day he put on his overcoat in the winter and made the rounds of the vacant store buildings. He walked up and down in the little paths through the brown weeds in the deserted streets, all day long, talking to himself. At night when the prairie wind rattled through the empty building, blowing snow and sand down the halls, and in little drifts upon the broken stairs, the old man's lamp was seen by straggling travelers burning far into the night. He told his daily visitors that he was keeping his books.

Thus the winter passed. The grass came with the light mist of March. By May it had lost its color. By June it was brown, and the hot winds came again in August, curving the warped boards a little deeper on the floor of the hotel porch. Herders and travelers, straggling back to the green country, saw him sitting there at twilight, looking toward the southwest, a grizzled, unkempt old man, with a shifting light in his eye. To such as spoke to him he always made the same speech: "Yes, it looks like rain, but it can't rain. The rain has gone dry here. They say it rained at Hutchinson, maybe so, I doubt it. There is no God west of Newton. He dried up in '90. They talk irrigation. That's an old story in hell. Where's Johnson? Not here! Where's Nickols? Not here! Bemis? Not here! Bradley? Not here! Hicks? Not here! Where's handsome Dick Barringer, Hon. Richard Barringer? Here! Here he is, holding down a hot brick in a cooling room of hell! Yes, it does look like rain, doesn't it?"

Cattle roamed the streets in the early spring, but the stumbling of the animals upon the broken walks, did not disturb him, and the winds and the drouth soon drove them away. The messenger with provisions came every morning. The summer, with its awful heat, began to glow. The lightning and the thunder joked insolently in the distance at noon; and the stars in the deep, dry blue looked down and mocked the old man's prayers as he sat, at night, on his rickety sentry box. He tottered through the deserted stores calling his roll. Night after night he walked to the red clay grade of the uncompleted "Air Line" and looked over the dead level stretches of prairie. He would have gone away, but something held him to the town. There he had risked all. Here, perhaps, in his warped fancy, he hoped to regain all. He had written so often, "Times will be better in the spring," that it was part of his confession of faith—that and "One good crop will bring the country around all right." This was written with red clay in the old man's nervous hand on the side of the hotel, on the faded signs, on the deserted inner walls of the stores—in fact, everywhere in Aqua Pura.

The wind told on him; it withered him and sapped his energy.

One morning he awoke and a strange sound greeted his ears. There was a gentle tapping in the building and a roar that was not the guffaw of the wind. He rushed for the door. He saw the rain, and bareheaded he ran to the middle of the streets where it was pouring down. The messenger from Maize with the day's supplies found him standing there, vacantly, almost thoughtfully, looking up, the rain dripping from his grizzled head, and rivulets of water trickling about his shoes.

"Hello, Uncle Dick," said the messenger. "Enjoying the prospect? River's risin'; better come back with me."

But the old man only answered, 'Johnson? Not here! Nickols? Not here! Bemis? Not here! Bradley? Not here! Hicks? Not here! And Barringer? Here! And now God's moved the rain belt west. Moved so far west that there's hope for Lazarus to get irrigation from Abraham."

And with this the old man went into the house. There, when the five days' rain had ceased, and when the great river that flooded the barren plain had shrunk, the rescuing party, coming from Maize, found him. Beside his bed were his balanced books and his legal papers. In his dead eyes were a thousand dreams.

Rev. B. M. Bridges Gives Facts in His Case

It is doubtful if there has ever been a medicine endorsed by so many ministers of the Gospel as has Tanlac. Indeed, there is scarcely a faith, creed or denomination in all the land in which one, or more, of the clergymen has not publicly expressed their indebtedness to the Premier Preparation for the benefits they have derived from its use.

One of the latest to speak out in this connection is Rev. B. M. Bridges, a widely known and beloved Baptist preacher, residing at Mooresboro, N. C., whose statement follows:

"Tanlac has given me a good appetite, toned up my system and renewed my strength in such a gratifying way that I am glad to recommend it to anyone who is in a run-down condition. For ten years past I have had such a severe case of indigestion that I could not find anything to eat that agreed with me. Finally I became very nervous and could get but very little sleep or rest.

"It seems that I took nearly everything trying to get myself right, but nothing helped me until I ran across Tanlac. My nerves are so much better now that my sleep is sound and refreshing. I enjoy my meals and have also gained weight. I can say from experience that Tanlac is a splendid medicine and tonic, for it has built me up wonderfully."

Tanlac is sold by all good druggists.

Letter From Former Pastor

Haddam, Kansas, Nov. 5, 1922.
Mr. Wm. Quance, Editor St. Joe News, St. Joe, Ind.

Dear Sir and Bro.: Thinking tonight of St. Joe friends and called to mind that I promised to write to you. We had a pleasant trip out here. Drove almost a thousand miles and no trouble except one blowout. Were camping out eight nights. Were held up for two days in Missouri because of mud and rain. We found an excellent people out here. They have received us well and things are starting off fairly well at the church. Tell F. B. L. we are trying to work some of his plans in our S. S. work. Have a S. S. of about 120 in attendance, with an enrollment of 150. Our preaching services have about as large attendance as the Sunday School.

The country here is very hilly. The roads are all dirt, and yet after raining for four days the past week, machines are running everywhere. Have been out over some of the hills with my class of boys a few times and certainly enjoy it. They certainly are a live bunch, 18 of them about the size of E. R. Kinsey's boys in the St. Joe school.

Yes, we get the News on Mondays. I believe that my subscription is nearly up and if you will send me a statement I will remit as we do not wish to miss an issue from back home in Indiana.

Yours,
C. O. Johnson.

We advised you right along to lay in your coal at least for two or three months ahead. The car supply is still very bad and with prospects of getting worse.

That we have been getting coal is due to the fact that we are on the preferred list with the people we have been dealing with, as we have dealt with them for years.
Don't wait. Order now. Don't blame us if you put it off too long.

Hard coal. Two cars running. See Bert Jackson and get in your orders if you haven't already.

Dog Theaves In St. Joe

Dog thieves visited Harvey Kimes, who resides in the west end of town, Sunday and made a clean get away with his three year old Blue Tick hound, a coon dog which he valued at $150.

Two men came to the Kimes home in an automobile. They talked to Mr. Kimes and looked at his dogs. Their conversation took Mr. Kimes and one of the men to the barn while the other man remained in the yard near the dog house. Presently the men heard the auto start and honk its horn and the stranger explained that the other man was in a hurry and he would have to join him. The men hurriedly sped away headed south.

Some time later Mr. Kimes discovered one of his dogs gone and decided that the stranger who had remained in the yard, had put the dog into the car while he was in the barn with the other man.

The number of the automobile was not known and no clue to the identity of the thieves is yet discovered. Mr. Kimes is making an effort to locate his dog and is offering $50 reward for its return.

Take Nie Sheffer To Angola

Nie Sheffer, who is under indictment charged with the double murder of his brother and sister-in-law, James W. and Cora Sheffer, was removed to the Steuben county jail at Angola Monday afternoon by Sheriff T. L. Hoodelmier. The trip was made by automobile. The cases against Sheffer were recently sent to Steuben county by Judge Dan M. Link, on a change of venue from DeKalb county at the request of the defendant. It is probable the trial will start Monday, November 27. Nie was glad to be taken to Angola. He said the change of quarters would do him good. He seems very anxious to have his trial begin.

It is not likely that John Sheffer, the aged father of Nie, will be able to take part in the trial. Mr. Sheffer was expected to be a star witness for his son, Nie. Mr. Sheffer is helpless at his home in Auburn, as the result of a stroke of paralysis.

G. A. Ward Goes To Albion

G. A. Ward, who has managed the local Grist Mill owned by the Farmers Co-Operative Milling Co, for the past several months has resigned his position. He will go to Albion Monday morning to manage and operate a mill there which is much larger and more up-to-date than the one he is leaving.

At the meeting of the Milling Company Monday night there were no definite arrangements made as to the hiring of a new manager, but it was decided that the mill would be kept in operation at least for grinding chop. Also it was decided to see about installing electric motors for power, which would take the place of the [illegible] power apparatus and the extra man.

I Will Give a $50 Reward

The Borthwicks Write

Daytona Beach, Nov. 6, 1922.
Dear Mr. and Mrs. Quance:

As you see we are quite a way from home. We are living a stone's throw from the ocean beach, one of the finest beaches in the world. It is also a fine speedway when the tide is out or partly out. Hundreds of autos are speeding down and back all day, a distance of twenty-two miles. We like it fine here so far, the children are in school and like it fine. Think we'd like the St. Joe News while we're down here, so will inclose a check for one dollar. Have just forgotten what the subscription price is, but this will bring the paper to us for quite a time.

Kindest regards to both of you and to all St. Joe friends.

Sincerely,
(Mrs.) H. C. Borthweck.

Simon Chubb Died Thurs.

Simon Chubb died Thursday November 9, at his home two and one-half miles north of Newville, after suffering for about two years with cancer in the head. The deceased was a well respected citizen in the community and a member in good standing in the U.B church. We are not informed as to his immediate relatives, but at the time of his death his family in the home consisted of his wife, one son and one daughter.

The funeral services were held at the U. B. church, Sunday afternoon November 12, Rev. Hubartt officiating. A large concourse of people attended the funeral. The floral offerings were many and beautiful interment in Riverview cemetery in care of E. R. Kinsey of St. Joe.

TURKEY RAISING MAY BE MADE VERY PROFITABLE OCCUPATION

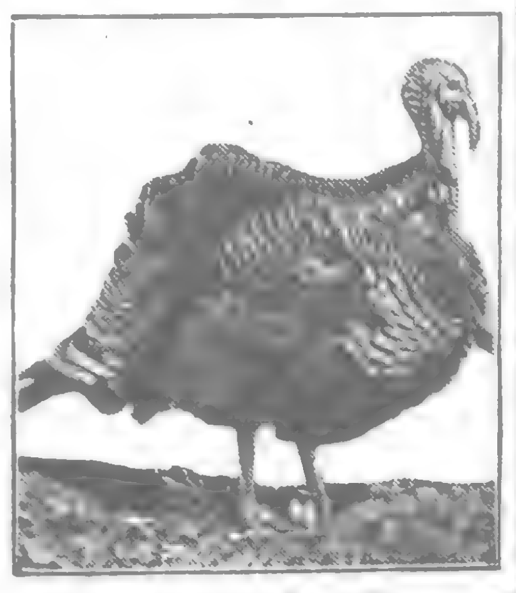
Driving a Flock of Turkeys to Market.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Despite a steady increase in the prices producers have received for turkeys since 1915, production has steadily decreased, according to figures published by the United States Department of Agriculture. The average prices received during the four months October to January, 1915-16, was 15 cents a pound. The average price received during the corresponding period in 1920-21, was 32 cents a pound. In 1900, the census figures showed 6,594,695 turkeys on farms in the United States, while in 1910, there were only 3,688,706, and in 1920 there were 3,627,028.

Big Increase in Price.

During the past six years the price of turkeys has increased to the producer more than 100 per cent, while during the past 20 years the number of turkeys produced has decreased about 50 per cent, the department states.



An Excellent Specimen.

It is common knowledge that turkeys are not easily handled, for by nature they are wanderers, and they usually give considerable concern to those whose duty it is to keep them on the home premises. The almost unconquerable inclination of turkeys to wander into the fields of neighbors has often caused strained feelings, and many owners of flocks have abandoned the business of raising turkeys on that account. Turkeys are also seriously afflicted by a disease known as blackhead which has caused heavy losses, and in some instances the business has been given up entirely for this reason. These causes of loss together with the frequent ravages of wild animals including dogs and rats, have all tended to discourage development of the industry.

The raising of turkeys may be a very profitable occupation where there is an abundance of range, ample feed, and reasonable freedom from preying animals, the department states. Even for those who have a limited range there are opportunities for raising a few turkeys each year if proper time and attention are devoted to it. The department points out, however, the desirability of those who enter the business to study it thoroughly in all its features.

Difficult to Ship Alive.

It is very difficult to ship turkeys alive to market since the shrinkage is very heavy. Ordinarily turkeys do not eat very much when confined, and therefore they are usually killed and dressed locally and then shipped to market, packed in barrels or boxes. Turkeys, like chickens, may be either scalded or dry picked, but the dry-picked birds are preferred in most markets because they keep better, and there are no losses of their substance by reason of a great deal of the soluble substance being removed by soaking in water or by packing in ice. There are conditions, of course, where there is no alternative but to pack the birds in ice and ship them in barrels. The objection to scalded-dressed birds does not obtain to the same extent where the birds are dressed and sold immediately to the consumer.

Turkeys mature and fleshen very much better in the fall when the atmosphere is crisp and fairly cold, such as prevails for some weeks preceding the holiday season. During this season the birds are in greatest demand, although the cold storage product may be had at all seasons. Warm weather during the week preceding the holidays has a marked effect on demand, and, other conditions being equal, the quality of dressed turkeys for the holiday market may be predicted to a great degree by weather conditions during the fall season.

PEAS WELL ADAPTED FOR MANY SECTIONS

Too Much Space Required for Growing in Garden.

Crop Will Thrive on Almost Any Good Garden Soil and Require Only Moderate Amount of Fertilizer —Alaska Seed Best.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Peas, sometimes spoken of as English peas, are adapted for growing from the Gulf of Mexico to Canada, and from Maine to California, with the exception of a few local sections where they do not thrive. Peas require too much space for growing extensively in the small garden, say specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture, but are especially adapted to the farm garden.

In Florida and certain of the gulf coast regions the seed is planted in the fall and the peas gathered during the first days of spring. Farther north the seed is planted in February and March and the peas ready for use in May and June. Going still farther into New England and the northwest they are planted in April and ready for use in July or August, all dependent, however, upon the locality. In the southern district, where the ground rarely ever freezes, the seeds are planted about 1½ inches deep, but farther north where late freezes are liable to form a heavy crust over the ground the seed should be covered three to four inches in light sandy soils but not quite so deep in heavier or clay soils.

DAIRYING GOOD STABILIZER

Provides Something for Farmer to Sell at Good Prices When Other Crops Fail.

Dairy farming should not supplant grain, fruit or a general live stock farming, but rather supplement them. Dairying will prevent some of the ups and downs in agriculture by acting as a stabilizer and providing something to sell at good prices when other crops fail.

The dairy business is not a get-rich-quick business, but it is a safe and sane business; a system of farming that builds up attractive homes, that creates more prosperity and supports more people than any other known form of agriculture.

SUCCESS WITH SHEEP FLOCK

It Is Necessary to Use Good Purebred Rams and Young Ewes Are Most Desirable.

In building up a flock of sheep, it is necessary to remember to do these things: 1. Use good purebred rams. 2. Select young ewes. Yearlings, two-year-olds, or perhaps, three-year-olds are far more desirable for starting a flock than older ones. 3. Discard broken-mouthed ewes and ewes with bad udders. 4. Choose ewes having good size, desirable forms and dense fleeces, the first year because a sheep makes its greatest growth during this period. 5. Give the flock good care throughout the entire year.

Brief News Notes.

Indianapolis.—"Corn husking is progressing satisfactorily," George C. Bryant, state agricultural statistician, says in a semi-monthly report on Indiana crop conditions to the United States Department of Agriculture. "Much of the corn has been cribbed and some moved to the market. Yields vary considerably but the quality is good generally. Some old corn still is on the farms."

Marion.—Clayton Jackson, colored, who was shot twice by Charles Keno, colored, following a quarrel, is in serious condition, physicians reported. Keno escaped after the shooting, but later was arrested. He told the police he intended to kill Jackson because "he had treated him mean."

Mount Vernon.—Jesse Hess of Plymouth has bought the law library and business interest of B. A. Trimble, prosecuting attorney. Mr. Trimble will move to Evansville at the expiration of his term of office.

Goshen.—The Goshen Ministerial association will take a religious census of Goshen. Seventeen active church organizations are [illegible] in this city.

Madison.—William Carr, [illegible]

Brazil.—With Brazil block coal selling at $4 at the mines small mines are being opened in the vicinity. The top, or "rider" vein, is being mined by stripping, while other mining is conducted in the side of hills or small shaft mines. In several communities the farmers have gone together to strip coal for their own use and for market. Coal miners have organized small companies and are starting operations. Brazil consumers are paying $5.25 to $5.75 a ton for coal delivered.

Anderson.—Francis A. Walker, judge of Madison county juvenile court and Republican nominee for judge of the Madison county Superior court, was made defendant in a suit filed in the Superior court by Jacob H. Powell, real estate broker, who demands $564 as a commission for selling Walker's farm. Powell recently attacked Walker in his office. Powell was arrested, but Walker did not appear in city court when the case was called for trial and it was dismissed.

Indianapolis.—A quick-witted street car bandit escaped police who were guarding both ends of a city car to prevent his escape. Forcing the motorman to open the front door as a policeman entered through the rear, the holdup jumped and landed squarely on Sergt. John Allison's foot. Sergeant Allison was waiting with open arms to nab the stickup artist, but grabbed the wounded pedal instead and the holdup escaped, firing a parting shot as he ran.

Lafayette.—Adoption of a definite program for the improvement of Indiana soils and the boosting of bread made from Indiana grown wheat marked the final session of the annual conference of county agents and agricultural extension workers at Purdue university. Plans for a campaign to encourage the wider use of Indiana flour, said by the agents to be the best for all home-baking purposes, were worked out and will be announced in a short time.

South Bend.—Clement Rice, age twenty-nine, overseas veteran, was killed and six other persons were injured when two automobiles crashed headon on a street crossing. Rice lived at Mishawaka. The others injured are: Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Young, Mrs. Clement Rice, Steve Nagy, Lena Rice and Louise Hyde, infant child of Dr. and Mrs. C. C. Hyde. Mrs. Young and Nagy are in the hospital.

Indianapolis.—Automobile license plates for 1923 will be ready for distribution here about December 12, H. D. McClelland, director of the automobile division of the secretary of state's department, has announced. The 1923 plates have white numerals on a brown background. Licenses for 412,000 passenger cars and 57,000 trucks have been issued to date this year, setting a new record, it was said.

Columbus.—Better babies for Bartholomew county will be the cause promoted by the Bartholomew County Anti-Tuberculosis society in connection with the state board of health, in a campaign started here. Mrs. Rose C. Armstrong, county nurse, has charge of the campaign. Examination of babies will be made in the towns of the county and motion pictures and lectures will be a part of the work.

Evansville.—Mrs. Clarence E. Smith, thirty-one, whose home is in Tell City, was brought to an Evansville hospital with a bullet wound in the forehead said to have been inflicted by her mother-in-law, Mrs. Sarah E. Smith, seventy-two. The women are said to have quarreled over family affairs. The aged mother-in-law when arrested said she was forced to act in her own defense.

Bedford.—Claud Brown, age forty-five, of Lebanon, a steeplejack, was killed here when he fell from a smokestack on the local shops of the Monon railroad. He had been painting the stack when a section of it broke, carrying him to the roof of the building.

Shelbyville.—Schools at Smithland, Shelby county, which have been closed for several days because of an epidemic of diphtheria in the community have been reopened. The disease is reported under control by county health authorities.

Wabash.—In his fiftieth year of continuous service as a minister in one church is the record of Rev. Dr Charles Little of this city. Doctor Little is pastor of Wabash Presbyterian church.

LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 19

JESUS THE FRIEND OF SINNERS

LESSON TEXT—Luke 7:37-48.

GOLDEN TEXT—This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.—I Tim. 1:15.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Luke 15:1-32.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Loves Everybody.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus the Friend of Sinners.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Sympathy of Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus Helps the Sinful and Sorrowful.

I. A Penitent Woman's Act of Love (vv. 37, 48).

1. Place of (v. 37). It was in the home of Simon the Pharisee while Jesus was sitting at meat. The feast must have been public, else she could not have so readily gained access.

2. The Act of (v. 38). She washed Jesus' feet with her tears and wiped them with her hair. Through some means she had heard of Jesus' pardoning grace, and God had opened her heart to receive Him as her Saviour. Out of a heart of gratitude she kissed His feet and anointed them with precious ointment.

3. Who She Was (v. 37). Her name is not mentioned. She was of a notoriously bad character. Though known to the public as a bad woman, something had happened which transformed her. She was now a saved sinner, because she believed on Jesus Christ.

II. The Pharisee's Displeasure (v. 39).

Simon felt scandalized by such a happening at his table. He was a respectable man. For Jesus to tolerate such familiarity on the part of a woman of such evil repute greatly perplexed him. He reasoned that if Jesus were a prophet He would have known the character of this woman and would have either withdrawn His feet from her or thrust her back with them, or if He knew her character His tolerance of such familiarity proved that He was not a good man. Simon's righteousness was of that sort which gathers up its skirts and gives the sinner a backward push into his filth.

III. Jesus Teaches the Pharisee (vv. 40-48).

He taught him by means of a parable of a creditor and two debtors. Observe that Jesus made it very clear that He not only knew the woman, but knew Simon also.

1. The Common Debt (v. 41). The woman was a sinner, so was Simon, though he was not the same kind of a sinner that she was. There were two debtors, though the one owed ten times as much as the other. This is representative of all sinners still. The Bible declares all to be sinners, yet recognizes degrees of guilt. Full credit ought to be given to the man who is honest, virtuous, generous and kind. Yet such a life will not secure entrance into heaven. The Savior's words are a severe rebuke to the respectable Pharisees who are sitting in judgment against the sinners of a coarser type.

2. The Common Insolvency (v. 42). "And when they had nothing to pay" Jesus freely granted the difference in the degree of the woman's sins and those of the Pharisee, but drove home to him the fact that they were both debtors and had nothing with which to pay (Rom. 3:23). Therefore all have need of a Saviour. As sinners we may quit our sinning and hate our deeds, but that does not make satisfaction for the sins of the past. What we have done is irrevocable—it has passed from our reach. Every transgression shall receive a just recompense of reward (Heb. 2:2). We must come to our Creditor, God Almighty, and acknowledge our insolvency and accept the kindness of Jesus Christ who bore our sins in His own body on the tree (I Pet. 2:24). We are all paupers, and instead of judging each other as to relative guilt, we should come to God and sue for pardon.

3. The Relation of Forgiveness and Love (vv. 44-48). Simon's reluctant answer to Jesus' question shows that he got the point of Jesus' teaching. In order to make His teaching concrete He turned to the woman, calling Simon's attention to what she had done in contrast to what he had done. Simon had neglected to extend to Jesus the common courtesies of a respectable guest, but this forgiven woman had lavished upon Him her affection and gifts. The measure of one's love is determined by the measure of the apprehension of sins forgiven. The one who is forgiven most will love most.

Virtue and Vice.

WOMEN NEED SWAMP-ROOT

Thousands of women have kidney and bladder trouble and never suspect it.

Women's complaints often prove to be nothing else but kidney trouble, or the result of kidney or bladder disease.

If the kidneys are not in a healthy condition, they may cause the other organs to become diseased.

Pain in the back, headache, loss of ambition, nervousness, are often times symptoms of kidney trouble.

Don't delay starting treatment. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a physician's prescription, obtained at any drug store, may be just the remedy needed to overcome such conditions.

Get a medium or large size bottle immediately from any drug store.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

Barrel of Rome Beauties From Lawrence County, Ohio, Showing Label Used by Co-operatives.

Thirty carloads of apples had been marketed co-operatively by three local growers' organizations in Gallia and Lawrence counties, Ohio, up to the first of October, with the marketing season just starting. This year marks the first efforts for large-scale co-operative fruit marketing in the state, and the success of this year's efforts is expected to result in the extension of the work over a considerably larger territory next year. The locals are affiliated with the Ohio Fruit Growers' Co-operative association and the State Farm Bureau federation.

Rome Beauties, an apple developed in Ohio and extensively grown in the southern part of the state, are packed in barrels like the one in the picture. The "Buckeye" label is the brand adopted by the Ohio co-operatives. Apples have been marketed by the co-operatives as far south as Florida and in a number of eastern markets. One sale of Grimes Golden, which netted growers over $1,000, made by them, was branded by market experts as one of the best sales in the country for this kind of fruit. The organizations were unable to fill all of their orders from this year's crop.

Peaches have been marketed by Ohio growers this year under the same co-operative plan, and with the use of the same brand name.

PLAN PROPOSED FOR AFFILIATING FORCES

Three Ohio Organizations Practically Agree on Terms for Co-operative Marketing.

Correlation of effort in co-operative live stock marketing in northwestern and north central Ohio is being sought by leaders of three farm organizations at the present time. Several conferences, attended by representatives of the Ohio Live Stock Shippers' association and the Ohio Farm Bureau federation, which are already affiliated in live stock marketing endeavor, and by Equity organizations which have been marketing live stock in connection with their co-operative elevators, have already been held.

While final agreement as to the methods of working together have not been adopted, definite proposals have been made for such agreement, and, with two or three exceptions, agreed upon by the organizations mentioned. Both sides, it is maintained by those favoring the affiliation, have much to gain by it.

Under the plan proposed the Equity shipping points would, in most instances, be made the local center of county co-operative companies that are operating in the territory.

While the final agreement has not been made, leaders on both sides believe that the difficulties standing in the way of highest efficiency in co-operative marketing by both the county co-operatives and the Equity organizations can be overcome.

CLUB BOY WON CHAMPIONSHIP

Norman Walker of Sloan, Ia., Is Winner at Sioux City Fair With His Fat Steer.

This club boy won the championship in the Shorthorn fat classes at the recent interstate fair at Sioux City in competition with over forty head, among them being very prominent shorthorn breeders. This thirteen-year-old lad is Norman Walker of Sloan, Ia., and he has been doing club work only one year. His steer, Buster Brown, is a purebred, fourteen months old. He was fed 260 days, his initial weight being 410 pounds, final weight 1,025 pounds, gaining 615 pounds with an average daily gain of 2.33 pounds. The average cost per pound of gain was .077, the initial cost of the steer was $28.70 and the total cost, including feed and labor, $76.42. Norman attributes his success first to selecting a well-bred steer, and second to his careful feeding. The feed consisted of ground corn, oats, barley, alfalfa, oil meal with a little brown sugar for dessert to whet Buster's appetite.

"Very well, then, the meeting is called to order!" Jachin Fell smiled as he rapped on the desk before him. "Election of officers—no, wait! The first thing on hand is to give our company a name. Suggestions?"

"I was thinking of that last night," said Lucie, smiling a little. "Why not call it the 'American Prince Oil company'?" And her eyes darted to Gramont merrily.

"Excellent!" exclaimed Jachin Fell. "My vote falls with yours, my dear—I'll fill in the blanks with that name. Now to the election of officers."

"I nominate Jachin Fell for president," said Gramont, quickly.

"Seconded!" exclaimed the girl, gayly, a little color in her pale cheeks.

"Any other nominations? If not, so approved and ordered," rattled Fell, laughingly. "For the office of treasurer—"

"Miss Lucie Ledanois!" said Gramont. "Move nominations be closed."

"Seconded and carried by a two-thirds vote of stockholders," chirped Fell in his toneless voice. "So approved and ordered. For secretary—"

"Our third stockholder," put in Lucie. "He'll have to be an officer, of course!"

"Seconded and carried. So approved and ordered." Mr. Fell rapped on the table. "We will now have the report of our expert geologist in further detail than yet given."

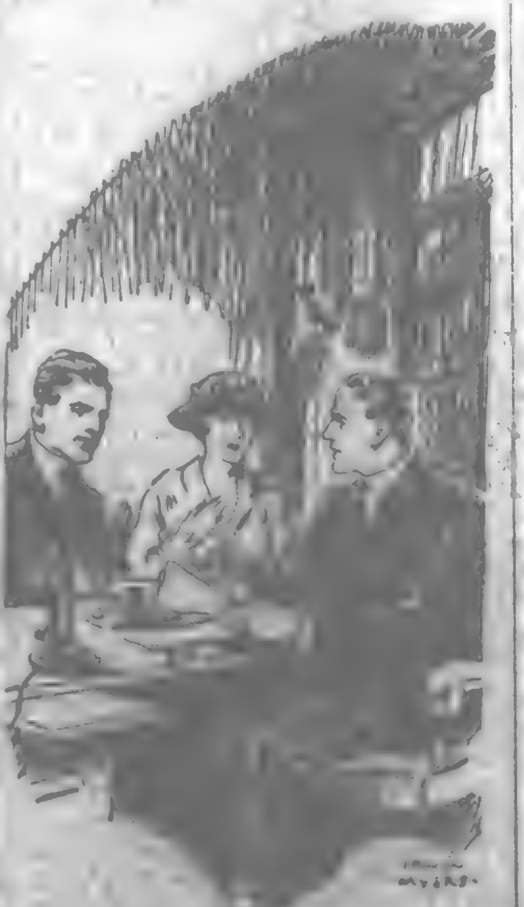
Gramont told of finding the oil; he was not carried away by the gay mock-solemnity of Jachin Fell, and he remained grave. He went on to relate how he had secured the lease option upon the adjoining land, and suggested that other such options be secured at once upon other property in the neighborhood. He handed the option to Fell, who laid it with the other documents.

"And now I have a proposal of my own to make," said Jachin Fell. He appeared sobered, as though influenced by Gramont's manner. "Although we've actually found oil on the place, there is no means of telling how much we'll find when we drill, or what quality it will be. Is that not correct, Mr. Gramont?"

"Entirely so," assented Gramont. "The chances are, of course, that we'll find oil in both quality and quantity. On the other hand, the seepage may be all there is. Oil is a gamble from start to finish. Personally, however, I would gamble heavily on this prospect."

"Naturally," said Mr. Fell. "However, I have been talking over the oil business with a number of men actively engaged in it in the Houma field. I think that I may safely say that I can dispose of the mineral rights to our company's land, together with this lease option secured yesterday on the adjoining land, for a sum approximating one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; reserving to our company a sixteenth interest in any oil located on the property. Personally, I believe this can be done, and I am willing to undertake the negotiations if so empowered by a vote of our stockholders. Lucie, you do not mind if we smoke, I know? Let me offer you a cigar, Mr. Gramont."

Gramont took one offered him, and lighted it amid a startled silence.



"I Nominate Jachin Fell for President," Said Gramont Quickly.

Fell's proposal came to him as a distinct [illegible] he was viewing it in the [illegible].

"[illegible]," exclaimed Lucie, wide-eyed, "that [illegible] to each of us, and not a cent expended."

that Miss Ledanois should receive the entire amount."

Lucie seemed a trifle bewildered.

"But—but, Henry!" she exclaimed. "What do you think of selling the lease to these other men?"

Gramont eyed the smoke from his cigar reflectively, quite conscious that Mr. Fell was regarding him very steadily.

"I can't answer for you, Lucie," he said at last. "I would not presume to advise."

Mr. Fell looked slightly relieved. Lucie, however, persisted.

"What would you do, then, if you were in my place?"

Gramont shrugged his shoulders.

"In that case," he said, slowly, "I would gamble. We know oil is in that ground; we know that it has been found in large quantities at Houma or near there. To my mind there is no doubt whatever that under your land lies a part of the same oil field—and a rich one. To sell fifteen-sixteenths of that oil for a hundred and fifty thousand is to give it away. I would sooner take my chances on striking a twenty-thousand barrel gusher and having the whole of it to myself. However, by all means disregard my words; that is not my affair."

Lucie glanced at Jachin Fell.

"You think it is the best thing to do; Henry does not," mused the girl. "I know that you're both thinking of me—of getting that money for me. Just the same, Uncle Jachin, I—I won't be prudent! I'll gamble! Besides," she added with smiling naivete, "I'm not a bit willing to give up having a real oil company the very minute it is formed! So we'll outvote you, Uncle Jachin."

Despite their tension, the two men smiled at her final words.

"That motion of mine has not yet been made," said Fell. Her rejection of his proposal had no effect upon his shyly smooth manner. "Will you excuse us one moment, Lucie? If I may speak with you in the outer office, Mr. Gramont, I would like to show you some confidential matters which might influence your decision in this regard."

Lucie nodded and leaned back in her chair.

Gramont accompanied Fell to the outer office, where Fell sent the stenographer to keep Lucie company. When the door had closed and they were alone, Fell took a chair and motioned Gramont to another. A cold brusquerie was evident in his manner.

"Gramont," he said, briskly, "I am going to make that motion, and I want you to vote with me against Lucie. Unfortunately, I have only a third of the voting power. I might argue Lucie into agreement, but she is a difficult person to argue with. So I mean that you shall vote with me—and I'm going to put my cards on the table before you."

"Ah!" Gramont regarded him coolly. "Your cards will have to be powerful persuaders!"

"They are," returned Jachin Fell. "I have been carefully leading up to this point—the point of selling. I have practically arranged the whole affair. I propose to sell the mineral rights in that land, largely on the strength of the signed statement you gave me a few moments ago. That statement is going to be given wide publicity, and it will be substantiated by other reports on the oil seepage."

"You interest me strangely." Gramont leaned back in his chair. The eyes of the two men met and held in cold challenge, cold hostility. "What's your motive, Fell?"

"I'll tell you: it's the interest of Lucie Ledanois." In the gaze of Fell was a strange earnestness. In those pale gray eyes was now a light of fierce sincerity which startled and warned Gramont. Fell continued with a trace of excitement in his tone.

"I've known that girl all her life, Gramont, and I love her as a father. I loved her mother before her—in a different way. I can tell you that at this moment Lucie is poor. Her house is mortgaged. She does not know, in fact, just how poor she really is. Of course, she will accept no money from me in gift. But for her to get a hundred and fifty thousand in a business deal will solve all her problems, set her on her feet for life!"

"I see," said Gramont with harsh impulse. "What do you get out of it?"

He regretted the words instantly. Fell half rose from his chair as though to answer them with a blow. Gramont, aware of his mistake, hastened to retract it.

"Forgive me, Fell," he said, quickly. "That was an unjust insinuation, and I know it. Yet I can't find myself in agreement with you. I'm firmly set in the belief that a fortune in oil will be made off that land of Lucie's. I simply can't agree to [illegible] for a company [illegible]. As I [illegible] at it [illegible] been poetic justice to make him hand over a small fortune to Lucie! But that deal is off, since he's in jail. And do you know why young Maillard wanted to buy the land? For the same reason you don't want to sell. I sent him out there and he saw that oil seepage, as I meant that he should! He thought he would skin Lucie out of her land, not dreaming that I had prepared a nice little trap to swallow him. And now you come along—"

[illegible]

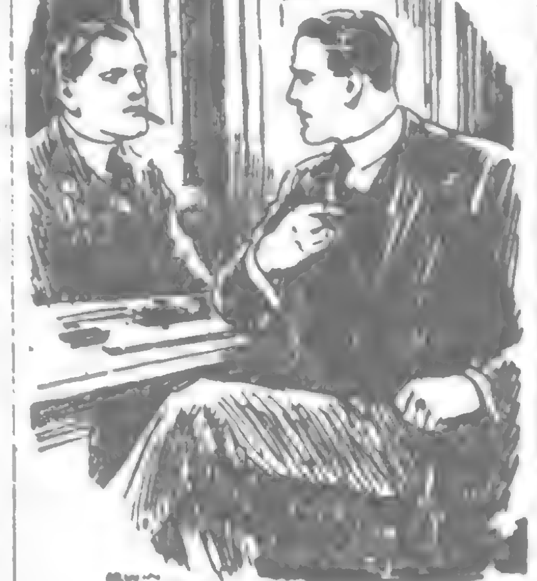
"Man, what are you driving at?" exclaimed Gramont. He was startled by what he read in the other man's face.

"Merely that I planted that oil seepage myself—or had it done by men I could trust," said Jachin Fell, calmly. He sat back in his chair and took up his cigar with an air of finality. "The confession is shameless. I love Lucie more than my own ethical purity. Besides, I intend to wrong no one in the matter."



"I See," Said Gramont With Harsh Impulse. "What Do You Get Out of It?"

Gramont sat stunned beyond words. The oil seepage—a plant.

There was no reason to doubt what Fell said. Gramont believed the little man sincere in his love for Lucie.

"No matter what the outcome, your reputation will not be affected," said Fell, quietly. "The company which will buy this land of Lucie's is controlled by me. You understand? Even if no oil is ever found there, I shall see to it that you will not be injured because of that signed statement."

Gramont nodded in dull comprehension. He realized that Fell had devised this whole business scheme with infernal ingenuity; had devised it in order to take a hundred and fifty thousand dollars out of his own pocket and put it into that of Lucie. It was a present which the girl would never accept as a gift, but which, if it came in the way of business, would make her financially independent. Nobody would be defrauded. There was no chicanery about it. The thing was straight enough.

"That's not quite all of my plan," pursued Fell, as though reading Gramont's unuttered thoughts. "The minute this news becomes public, the minute your statement is published, there will be a tremendous boom in that whole section. I shall take charge of Lucie's money, and within three weeks I should double it, treble it, for her. Before the boom bursts she will be out of it all, and wealthy. Now, my dear Gramont, I do not presume that you will still refuse to vote with me? I have been quite frank, you see."

Gramont stirred in his chair.

"Yes!" he said, low-voiced. "Yes, by heavens, I do refuse!"

With an effort he checked hotly impulsive words that were on his tongue. One word now might ruin him. He dared not say that he did not want to see Fell's money pass into the hands of Lucie—money gained by fraud and theft and crime! He dared not give his reasons for refusing. He meant now to crush Fell utterly—but one wrong word would give the man full warning. He must say nothing.

"It's not straight work, Fell. Regardless of your motives, I refuse to join you."

Jachin Fell sighed slightly, and laid down his cigar with precision.

"Gramont," his voice came with the softly purring menace of a tiger's throat-tone, "I shall now adjourn this company meeting for two days, until Saturday morning, in order to give you a little time to reconsider. Today is Thursday. By Saturday—"

"I need no time," said Gramont.

"But you will need it. I suppose you know that Bob Maillard has been arrested for parricide? You are aware of the evidence against him—all circumstantial?"

A DAY AT THE COUNTY SEAT

All have heard of the slogan "See America First". When we, a group of St. Joe students, learned that we were to have a day in which we visit other schools, we thought "see DeKalb county first", and decided to visit in our county seat high school.

As we arrived after school had taken up we did not wish to wait at the building until the next period. Some members of the party had never really been through the Court House, which is perhaps the best architectural work in the county, therefore we felt it would be worth our while to go on a tour of inspection.

Here we saw the large clock (on the first floor) by which every clock in the building is regulated. By watching closely one can see the weights pull the hands around. This system causes all the clocks to have the same time.

At the right and left of the first landing (going up) are two large oil paintings. The title of one is "The Spirit of Industry", showing the many industries of Indiana, some of which are only in their infancy. The other "The Spirit of progress", is concerning our early history and christening. This portrays Baron DeKalb being crowned by the goddess Fortuna; the struggle of our first settlers with the Indians; and the peace-loving pioneers making their homes—our homes.

Passing on up the stair we met Mr. Hathaway, our recorder. He was very hospitable and conducted us through his suit of offices. Here we saw hand written books of the year 1843. We also saw a book in which was recorded the St. Joe News for the year 1894. This was exceedingly interesting and amusing. Court was not in session, thus we looked in the court rooms (and through all open doors).

By this time it was nearly time for the third period (10:00), consequently we hurried back to the building. In the principle's office we selected our program. The classes being still in session, we had to wait a few minutes.

Clang! Clang! The gong sounded twice and from the class rooms flocked about two hundred students. For the next five minutes they were allowed to loiter in the hall. They surely made good use of their time, too, as one could hardly hear themself think. Yes, these are privileges, but I believe I would rather have our own order and partial quietness.

At the sounding of three bells the hall again filled with pupils going to classes. During this period (third) we attended a History II class. The pupils were rather mischievous and several pranks were played.

The first class which we visited after lunch was Latin I. The teacher was very kind to us. She mistook me for a teacher. (I never thought I looked that old.) This class was very orderly and recited the lesson well.

We then attended an Algebra class. I do not know whether it was because visitors were present or not, but these pupils were exceedingly studious and well behaved.

We could so often make use of the Public Library in connection with our school work, therefore we thought it would be a good plan to acquaint ourselves with it. We finished the day by going from the school building to the Library. In the basement of this building is a relic room. Here we saw objects from the time of the Revolution, and from many parts of the globe. An hour or more was spent in the reading room before we returned home.

The Auburn High School is fine, having all modern equipment and teachers, yet I would rather go to the St. Joe High School, for here the teachers have more time to know the students and to teach them accordingly.

Alice Tustison.

SURGERY ANCIENT ART

Delicate Operations, Hitherto Thought Modern, Revealed by Egyptian Document—Shows Evidence of Advanced Knowledge.

Chicago.—The restoration of youth to the aged, attempted recently by means of animal glands, was also attempted at least 3,000 years ago, according to Dr. James H. Breasted of the University of Chicago. An "Incantation of Transforming an Old Man Into a Youth of Twenty" is set forth in the Edwin Smith papyrus, the Egyptian document which Doctor Breasted has declared contains unparalleled evidence of advanced knowledge and scientific spirit on the part of Egyptian physicians of 1800 B. C. or earlier.

The incantation, on the contrary, he said, is characterized by reliance on hocus-pocus. Doctor Breasted's theory is that an extraordinary book on surgery and external medicine fell into the hands of a quack who was more interested in charms for making old men young, and who had the incongruous texts combined in the same roll. Thus in the papyrus magical formulae jostle an exposition of delicate surgical operations heretofore believed to be decidedly modern.

The handwriting indicates that it was probably written about 1800 B. C., and it was thought to be a copy of a manuscript that is at least a thousand years older. The original may have been written as early as 3400 B. C., it is thought, by some of the words which appear in the manuscript and which were long out of vogue in 1800 B. C.

The manuscript also contains "The Incantation of [illegible] the Wind of the Year of Pest." This shows the widely prevalent notion which has persisted to the present day [illegible] winds [illegible] The last two [illegible] written in a [illegible] ing [illegible]

FRESHMEN:

Mr. Maxwell has announced that we are soon to have a test in Civics. We are waiting patiently.

When the spelling report came out this week the faces of the Freshmen were not quite so long as they had been the week before. But at that we had no reason to be especially cheerful. L. C.

SOPHOMORE:

We think that Miss Schmalsried had better take the entire Freshmen class into her office for a special spelling drill, instead of a few of the most needy ones. It might even be well for her class of Juniors.

Monday morning holds no horrors for the Sophs. We had an extra good lesson on an extra difficult chapter of Caesar this morning. L. E. K.

SENIOR:

A good time was reported from those who attended the Senior Class party last Thursday evening.

An extra Grammar class is being held each day this week for the benefit of the Juniors and Seniors who claim that learning Grammar is, to them, an impossibility. R.W.

C. B. HAVENS, PASTOR

The One institution that has played an important part in world affairs for almost 2,000 years is the Church.

History reveals the weakness and the strength of this old institution Its weakness in the past we can not change. The strength it has had in the past is to be adored.

The question of today is, what will you do to make this important institution a real vital force in the community life.

There is nothing that means any more to St. Joe than St. Joe's churches. You should help these institutions to function to their maximum strength.

You are welcome to the Methodist Church.

IT WAS near the close of a long session—a session which had lasted a winter and a spring and a summer, and threatened to push itself into the first days of autumn, when Wharton, the western member, who had been in the house five terms, concluded to pack his valise and go home. The campaign was growing warm. Nearly all of the county conventions had been held, and a majority of the delegates elected were instructed for him, which insured his renomination if the three remaining counties in the district did not go solidly against him. He had laid his plan mechanically for a renomination, and if he had stopped to ask himself whether or not he really wanted to come back to congress, he would probably have said no. He was tired, but he did not know why. He thought he needed rest, that he had been overworked, that he was played out; yet his private secretary, who kept the run of the pension business and did his routine work, did not seem tired—the private secretary even had refused a vacation, and it was at the secretary's own request that he stayed in Washington.

But Wharton, the western member, was tired—dead tired, and he pictured to himself the pleasures of going back to his home in the little town of Baxter, where people on the streets who had seen him grow up from a boy and called him "Tom," really were glad to see him. Just before he had left his rooms for the departing train his private secretary had handed him the day's clippings; and after he had been riding for an hour or so, while he was fumbling in his pockets for a match, they tumbled out in a tight little roll. He idly read them. He was used to unjust abuse and sick of uncalled-for praise. The first clipping was taken from the Queen City Daily Herald; it bore a Washington date line, and was introduced by the words, "Special to the Herald." It read:

They say here that Wharton of the Fourth district, is beginning to feel uneasy. He has received several letters from his district that have convinced him that the Populist cyclone has shaken down several lengths of fence in Lee, Meade and Smith counties. Bill Heatley's strength is said to be developing down there wonderfully. The Hon. Ike Russell, who was here last week looking for a job as receiver of the Baxter National bank, was in close consultation with Wharton three of the four nights he was here, and the "old man" is wearing a hunted look and is talking to himself. They say down in the Fourth district that it will take more than "Our Tom" Wharton's hug to explain away his silver vote.

Wharton knew the correspondent and only smiled as he flipped the wadded clipping out of the car window. There was a short editorial clipping from the same paper. It read:

The dispatches say that "Our Tom" Wharton is wiggling in his seat and trying to project his astral body in the Fourth district to see how his fences are, and at the same time to keep his corporeal body in Washington to look after Ike Russell's pie plate. If "Our Tom" doesn't fall down in his anxiety to keep one foot in the "bloody Fourth" and the other at the political bake shop, he must be either a Colossus of Rhodes or a "quadrille dancer."

Wharton dropped that on the floor and read another from the Smith County Farmer's Friend. It was long and full of double leads and "break lines" and italics and exclamation points. It was abusive in the extreme and closed with this tirade:

Now, let us reason together. Tom Wharton has been in congress ten years; he had been judge six years before entering congress, and county superintendent four years before he was judge. Twenty years has this man been in office; his total salary in that time has been only $70,000. Yet he is rated by the commercial agencies at one-half million dollars. He has banks and railroad stock; he owns mortgages and farms. Where did he get them? His time has been sold to the people; he has been false to every trust; he has voted with the East on the money question; he has neglected the farmers at every turn. He is a garden-seed congressman; he comes out here and haw-haws around, and then goes back to vote with Wall street. Wall street knows its friends, and "Our Tom" is worth one-half million dollars, lives in a mansion filled with hammered brass at Baxter, while the farmer foots the bills.

Wharton knew that the editor of the Farmer's Friend had been a candidate for the post office at Smith City; that he himself had lent the editor money and held his note for $500. He put the clipping in his pocketbook with a sigh, and looked through the other scraps of paper. There were perhaps a dozen—a few of them laudatory to an offensive degree, some clearly bids for money, and the rest a fair discussion of his candidacy.

Wharton's first week in the district was spent at Baxter. He did practically nothing to secure his renomination, although wise-looking men from each of the three doubtful counties came every day to Baxter and went directly from the train to Wharton's house. They all wanted money or promises of "assistance"; and each of them told how some precinct could be "swung into line" by a little work on the part of the certain third person—always nameless—who would need money for cigars and livery hire. Wharton put these statesmen off, and they went away doubting whether they would support the "old man" or fight him. The congressman's presence in the little town was an event, and he had callers all day long who seemed to need help in different ways. Soldiers desired pensions, mothers asked for positions in Washington for their sons; young women called to see about clerkships; widows, whose husbands he had known, came to borrow money. He was honestly glad to see all these people and, when he could, he helped them; he rarely made an enemy, even though he always was frank.

It was Saturday evening, and Wharton was just entering on his second week at home, he and his friend, "Ike" Russell, were sitting on the southern porch of the congressman's home. Their wives and daughters were in the parlor around the piano, and the two men were at that preliminary stage of conversation in which ideas are conveyed by grunts and monosyllables.

"What did Hughey of Smith City want today?" asked Russell.

"About two hundred, more or less," said the congressman.

"Hughey's a thief; he'd spend about $25, and the rest would go into his jeans."

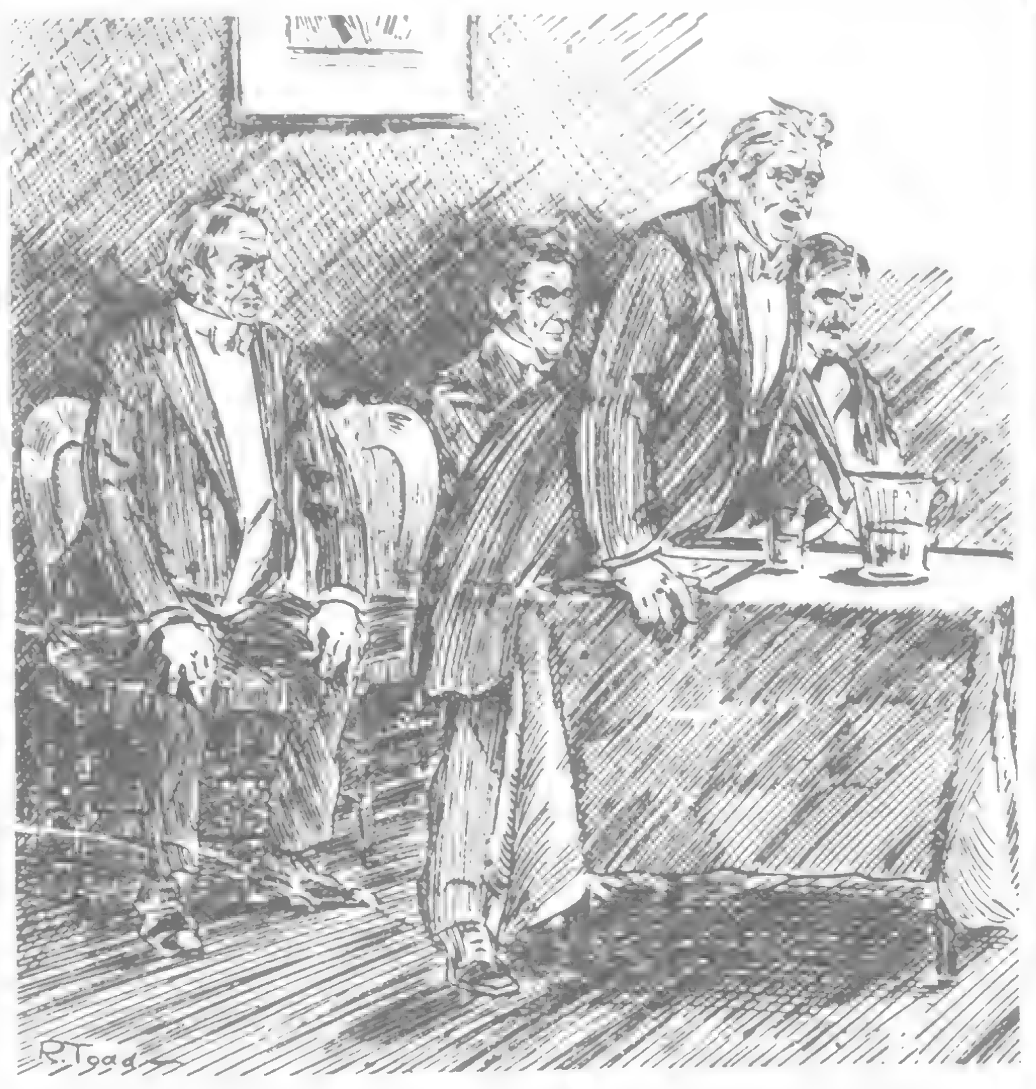
"I suppose so," Wharton answered. "Say we lose Smith county?"

"Well, you say," said his friend. "Did you see Higgins, from Lee valley? He told me last month that he had five fellows who could swing Lee county for $100 apiece."

"Ugh," grunted the congressman. "That makes $2,300 so far, if I come down."

"Well, that's cheaper than you got off before—by several hundred."

Wharton yawned, and the silence that followed was broken only by the tinkle of the cow bells in the valley below the town, and the splash of water over the dam across the river that runs around the village. Occasionally the sound of voices singing on the water or the notes of a guitar would come up on the gusts of wind. The piano in the parlor was silent, and the moon was barely visible under the eastern corner of the porch. The men had smoked in silence a few moments when Wharton said:



"They Were Tall, Thin, Spare Men in Swallow-tail Coats and Chokers, and Hair That Looked Fierce and States manlike."

"Ike, what is the real issue in this campaign?"

"I dunno, old man; sometimes I think it's the tariff; sometimes I think it's silver; and then at other times I just give it all up. What's your idea, Tom?"

The congressman did not reply at once; he seemed to be pulling his ideas together for a longer speech than usual. He twisted his gray mustache nervously; he looked askance at his friend, who was apparently listening to the music that had just started up again in the parlor. Wharton went over to the garden hose which was turned upon a shrub, changed its course, came back, relighting his cigar, and said:

"B'Godfrey, I don't know, Ike, I don't know. Do you remember when we used to cut corn at six cents a shock, and go to school down the valley where those cow bells were tinkling a little while ago? We used to sit on the fence of nights like this and talk 'way into the night about what we were going to do?"

"Yes?" said the politician, expectantly.

"Yes, and I used to hope to go to congress some day; we used to talk of the old-time statesmen and read their speeches in the school readers—Clay and Calhoun and the great men whose names we knew as boys. They were tall, spare men in swallow-tailed coats and chokers, and hair that looked fierce and statesmanlike. Do you remember the congressman from this district forty years ago; how dignified he was, what a really great man he must have been? He lived greatness every hour of his life. The men who went to the territorial legislature—how superior they seemed, with their tall hats and close-buttoned coats! Ike, do you remember when I went to the legislature in the winter of '70, and came back discouraged and disappointed with the sham of it all—the row and the rings and the schemes?"

Russell would have interjected some reminiscent joke on the young statesman, but Wharton went on as if to keep the thread of the conversation in his teeth.

"Yes, yes, Ike, I know about my plug hat and all that; and then do you remember how I ran for judge and was nominated for congress back in '84 as a dark horse on the three hundredth ballot, and how I was elected and told the people from the box down by the bonfire in the public square that I was going to be worthy of the honor? Ike, the tears I shed there was honest tears for God knows how proud I was. All these ten years were before me, and what a great ten years I hoped they would be. I thought of my plans as a boy—you and me on the fence down in the valley, Ike—and I looked over all the names in congress then—ten years ago I mean—and they seemed great names to me. I could hardly wait to get to Washington to see the men and to be one of them. I was such a boy, Ike—ten years ago."

Each man puffed his cigar in a moment's pause. Wharton lighted a fresh one. Russell thought in so many words: "It's one of Tom's talkative nights."

Wharton took up the thread where it had dropped.

"Here I am, Ike, a flesh-and-blood statesman. I've been in it and through it. I've held as high a place in the organization of the house as any of the great men we used to read about. I've passed a pension bill—and the old soldiers, for whom I worked night and day during six months, have passed resolutions against me. I have had my name on a silver bill for which the fiat money fellows have abused me. I've led my party through two successful fights. And what is there in it? You know, as well as I do, that it is hollow—all a hollow show. What's the use of it? Why should a man wear his life out up there in that city just to keep his name in print? There was a man named Keifer—an Ohio man, who was speaker of the house once. Who that reads the papers knows anything of him today? Yet he worked his life nearly out to be a statesman. Where are the seconds in the Blaine-Conkling fight? Ike, there's nothing in it but ashes."

The politician said nothing; he did not know how the talk was turning.

"Ike," resumed the congressman, taking a firmer hold on his cigar, and tightly grasping the arms of the chair, "Ike, what's the use? Here comes a lot of Bills and Dicks and Toms and Harrys, who want me to put up $2,300 and promises that I'll be two years working to keep, just to go back there. I go back there and work and fret and stew for this, that and for the other thing that I don't care a cent for. I have no heart in it; I feel like a sneak; I have to swallow my pride; I've no ideals; there is no reward; nothing but higgling with a lot of mercenary, impecunious thieves here at home, and log-rolling with a lot of shrewder shysters of the same sort in congress at Washington. If I go on, I must buy my way in; buy my own slavery, Ike, slavery to the fellows I despise. I know I've done it three or four times, but I kept thinking the end would some day justify the means. But it doesn't; it never will; it's a fraud, Ike, and I'm done. I am going to be honest just for once in my life. I don't have to go to congress; I can be lots happier here—here with friends and my family and—now don't laugh, old man—and—and—my honor. That's a little stagey, Ike, but that's the real issue in this campaign and I'm out of this fight. Let's go in and hear the music, Ike. That's the end of it, I've thought it all over and I've decided."

Probably most men—at least most moralizing men—would have called the "old man" weak had they seen him the following Monday making out a check payable to Isaac Russell for $2,300. But most men do not know what it is to worship an idol for a lifetime, and they cannot understand how a man can love his idol even when he knows to his bitter sorrow that it is only clay.

A Spellbinder.

"Your wife makes a splendid speech."

"Yes," replied Mr. Meekton; "and I noticed she impressed an entire audience the same way she does me. She says what she likes and no one even thinks of talking back."—Washington Star.

ROAD BUILDING

CLEAN MATERIALS FOR ROAD

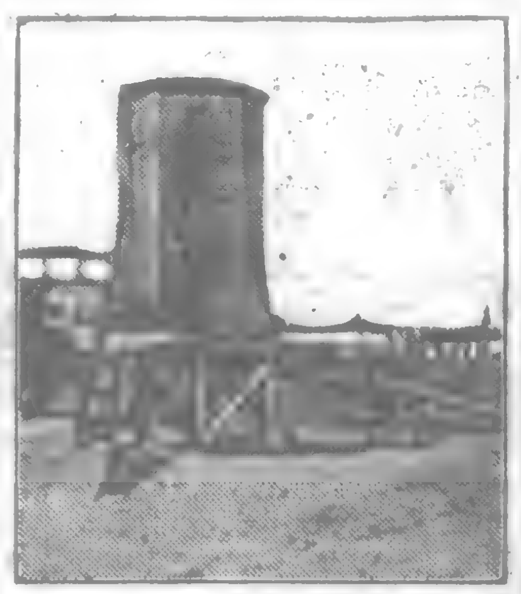
Builder Gets Perfect Concrete Aggregates Along Route of Job by Ingenious Method.

Elimination of the long haul with the assurance at the same time that sand and gravel used in concrete road construction would be thoroughly clean and free from organic impurities was achieved in an ingenious and economic manner on a section of the Denver-Morrison highway. Comparatively shallow deposits of both required components of the aggregate to be used in mixing this concrete were discovered in the bed of a small stream which flowed within a quarter of a mile of the job.

The contractor determined to utilize this natural deposit rather than incur the expense and loss of time incident to purchase or preparation of the aggregates in town and consequent long haul to the mixer. As it was necessary to wash and screen his aggregates as well as to elevate for loading into trucks, the contractor decided to attempt these operations all in one move if possible.

Accordingly he obtained a six-inch centrifugal pump and about 800 feet of six-inch iron pipe. A small sump or pit was excavated in the bed of the stream and the intake of the centrifugal pump was laid in this pit. The bottom of this pit was below the level of the ground water in the gravel bar or bed of the creek. The pump took in water, sand and pebbles as large as three inches in diameter from this sump and delivered them through the discharge line which was approximately 700 feet in length to a flat screen on top of the bins.

The supply of sand and stone in the sump was continuously renewed by means of horse-drawn slip scrapers. A screen composed of flat bars was placed across the top of the sump to eliminate intake of oversize stones which could not be handled by the pump. At the end of the delivery line, the water, sand and stone were discharged upon a flat screen having square three-eighths of an inch mesh opening. The water and sand, of course, fell through this screen while the larger pebbles rolled on over it and thence into a bin for pebbles.



A Novel Method of Washing and Elevating Gravel for Road Construction.

Below the first screen was a sand settling box. The water and sand fell into this box and the sand being heaviest, immediately settled to the bottom while the water carrying the dirt and silt escaped through a wasteway in the top of the box. As the sand accumulated in the bottom, it was discharged through gates at periodic intervals into the sand compartment of the bins beneath.

The force of the water, sand and stone passing through the pipe line was sufficient to scour every particle absolutely free from dirt and impurity of every kind. The pump was driven by a 60-horsepower traction engine.

ROAD-MAINTENANCE TRUCK

Implement Carries Concrete Mixer and Combination Bin for Cement, Sand and Gravel.

A highway-maintenance truck, described in the Popular Mechanics Magazine, has been put into operation in California, which would seem to be the last word in complete equipment. It carries a concrete mixer and combination material bin for cement, sand and gravel. Also an air compressor and air tank which can be used for driving a rock drill for road work, or can be used in connection with a water-supply tank as a spraying outfit or fire extinguisher.

There is also a centrifugal pump which can be used for filling the water tank or for pumping out cisterns or caissons. The truck engine furnishes all necessary power for driving the auxiliary equipment at various speeds through a special transmission. Flanged wheels may be substituted if so desired.

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

AIR ADVERTISEMENTS

"Well," said the Fairy Queen, "there is only one item sent in to the Natureland News this time, and that is from Tad, the Black Cat."

"What is that?" asked the other Fairies.

"Tad," said the Fairy Queen, "sent in an announcement and asked us if we'd please publish it as he would be glad to have as many see it as possible."

"What was the announcement?" the other Fairies asked.

"It was this," said the Fairy queen, as she took forth a piece of paper upon which in strange sprawling words was written:

"Tad, the Black Cat, is giving an At Home Tuesday Evening in the Alley.

"It is his second birthday. All those who wish to bring him birthday presents may care for his list of suggestions, which is as follows:

"Mice, Milk, Cream, Sausage, Liver, and all other delicacies.

"Ribbons he does not care for."

The Fairies all laughed after they had read this. No one but a Fairy could have read such strange writing as Tad wrote!

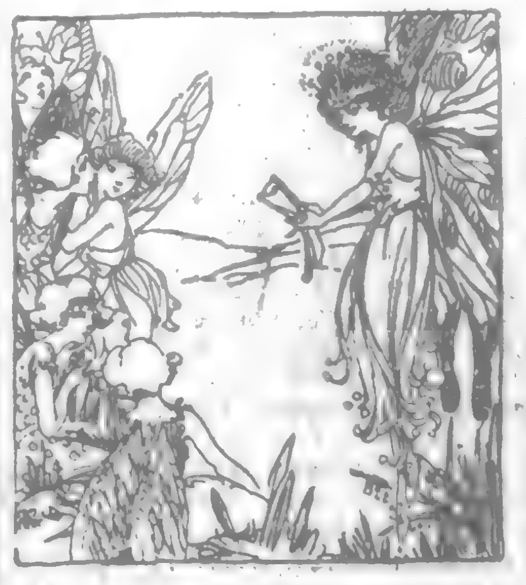
"I believe Mr. Sun and Mr. Moon want to talk to us this afternoon. They're both to be in the sky at the same time, you know, today, and they have something most especially important they want to tell us."

At that moment the Fairy Queen looked up and there she saw Mr. Moon smiling. Mr. Sun, of course, was shining brightly.

She had been waiting to see Mr. Moon.

"You had something to say to us today?" she asked.

"Ah, yes, Fairy Queen," said Mr. Moon. "Now you know I've looked down at signboards and I've seen big signs. I've been told by Midgie Moon that these were known as advertisements because they advertised or praised some special article.



"It Was This."

"As I said the other day, Mr. Moon has no substitutes. I've seen that on signboards about other things.

"And I explained, or you explained, Fairy Queen, what substitutes meant. Perhaps you will explain today?"

"Gladly," said the Fairy Queen, "though I may not do it as well as you could, Mr. Moon."

"Oh, most gracious Fairy Queen," said Mr. Moon, "I'm delighted at the compliment, but I am willing to let you do the explaining."

"A substitute is something put in the place of another," the Fairy Queen began.

"Now, if I were asked to go to a party and I sent a substitute, it would mean I would be sending some one in my place. Isn't that right, Mr. Moon?"

"Fine, fine," said Mr. Moon.

"Well, to continue," he added, "I think Mr. Sun and I shall give air advertisements and write our signs on the clouds. I shall put on mine:

"'Accept no substitutes for Mr. Moon. There is nothing the same. Money returned if not satisfactory, and if any has been given! Insist upon Mr. Moon's shining, and none other.'"

"And I shall have one, too," said Mr. Sun. "Mine shall be:

"'Others have tried to shine, but they cannot shine as Mr. Sun. There will always be those who will imitate him and try to be as bright.

"'But accept only the real Mr. Sun. He has stood the test of ages.'"

"Fine, fine," said the Fairy Queen.

"The only thing is," said Mr. Moon, "that we wouldn't want to disfigure the clouds by putting signs on them, and we really have no rivals."

"That's true," said Mr. Sun, "and I think it would be a pity to put signs on the clouds. We want some of Mother Nature never to be touched by signs and advertisements."

"I think that is best," said the Fairy Queen, [illegible]

"However Mr. Sun and Mr. Moon [illegible]," ended the Fairy Queen.

Tanlac Put Him Back on Job, Says Davis

"I've never been much of a hand at praising medicines, but I can certainly say something good for Tanlac," said Geo. Davis, 110 Naglee St., San Francisco, Calif.

"I had a bad case of ptomaine poisoning and it came pretty near laying me out altogether. For three months I was in an awful condition and suffering constantly from diarrhea. I became weak all over and was going from bad to worse. I tried everything I knew of, but it was beginning to look like nothing would ever reach my case.

"Then, a friend of mine recommended Tanlac to me. And it's a fact, four bottle have made a clean sweep of my troubles and built me up to where I feel like a new man. I am working every day now and when it comes to recommending Tanlac I can't put it too strong."

Tanlac is sold by all good druggists.—Advertisement.

Country Signs.

The Woman was driving in the north woods and so charmed was she with the views, the glimpses of silver lakes, the rugged hills, the woods, that for quite a while she forgot about time, and a definite appointment, relates the Chicago Journal. Suddenly, however, she remembered she was due at a certain place at 1:30.

They had told her that it was a straight road for nine or ten miles, and then the road forked, and then—But the rest of the directions the Woman had forgotten. Was she to take the road to the right or the left? But surely there'll be a signboard at the forks, she thought, and that would tell her what to do.

And when she got to the forks there was the signboard, and in straggly black letters it announced: "Either Road."

ANYTHING TO BE OBLIGING

Little Thing Like That Mentioned Was Nothing to This Applicant for American Citizenship.

At each hearing where applications of foreign-born persons seeking citizenship in the United States are considered and passed on, incidents come up which add humor to the otherwise serious process. At a recent hearing before Judge W. W. Thornton of the Superior court, Room 1, George Mackay, United States naturalization officer, was quizzing an applicant regarding his knowledge of the inner workings of the government and regarding the history of the United States.

"Who was the first President of the United States?" he asked.

"Washington, D. C." replied the anxious applicant.

"Just leave off the D. C.," said Mr. Mackay.

"Oh, I don't care," said the applicant nonchalantly, with an accompanying gesture of his hand.—Washington Star.

Speed Necessary.

"Of course," said Miss Cayenne, "I am willing to pay more for rapid work."

"How rapid must it be?" inquired the dressmaker.

"Rapid enough to keep a dress from going out of style between the time I order it and the time I get a chance to wear it."

Poetry is truth set to music.

Milk for the Baby.

Two-year-old Betty had always used a special brand baby milk but recently has been drinking very little, preferring the more solid foods. At the dinner table a few days ago it became the subject of discussion and it was decided to discontinue the special milk when Phyllis, six years old, who had been listening with interest, inquired: "Daddy, where do they get milk for babies? Is that calf's milk?"

In All Humility.

"How do you think the financial relationships of the world ought to be adjusted?"

"Tain't for me to say," replied Farmer Corntossel. "I can't even get the mortgage paid off of a 50-acre farm."

PRESCRIPTION FOR LONG LIFE

According to This German Physician, It Is Easy to Add to One's Years of Usefulness.

The gathering of centenarians which took place the other day recalled the case of the eminent German physician, Doctor Fischweiler, who died recently at the age of one hundred and nine. He often declared that he possessed an infallible rule for securing longevity, which he would reveal to the world in his will. Upon his death, then, this formula was disclosed:

"Put your bed, orienting it by means of a compass, so that you will have your head placed north, and lie in a horizontal position. Sleep solidly with closed fists."

This is the whole secret. This position, it is asserted, brings the body in communication with the great tellurian currents coming from the north and insures an extremely happy blood circulation.

Still Companions.

Uncle Josiah is a Parke county farmer, who for many years, though a deacon in the church, took his "nip" on the side. But he always strenuously denied the charge. His two college nephews came to see him the other day, and he tried to impress them. He showed them the old place. "It's all here as it was when you were little fellows," he said, "except the old oaken bucket, an' it's—"

"Down in the cellar with all the extra jugs and jars since the Volstead bill became a law," one of them winked.

Uncle tried to look still more pious. "The trouble with the generation of today is that they are so worldly," he began.

Then nephew finished it for him, "and wise."—Indianapolis News.

Not for Discussion.

"I understand your campaign fund is quite large."

"Let's change the subject," interrupted Senator Sorghum. "It isn't large enough to be worth mentioning."

How Many Fish Did Charles Catch?

Charley met his friend James on the street and told him that he had been fishing.

"How many fish did you catch?" asked James.

Charley replied: "If to the books of the Old Testament, you add the number of books of the New Testament; Multiply that by the number of Apostles that were present at the Transfiguration; Divide by the number of books written by Luke; Subtract the number of times the Isrealites marched around Jerico; Multiply by the number of pieces of silver Judas received for betraying Christ; Divide by the number of spies Moses sent into Canaan; Add the number of letters in the name of the city in which a man climbed up a tree to see Christ; and Divide by the number of Apostles that were called the Sons of Thunder. The answer will be the number of fish I caught."

Any one who may have the answer please send it to the News office for approval.

HOW ITALY HELPS HER UNEMPLOYED

Great Construction Work Being Carried Out by the Opera del Combattenti.

BILLIONS OF LIRE ARE PAID

Policy Contemplates Using Money as Investment to Benefit the State—Reclaiming Marsh Land—Roads and Railways Built.

Rome.—In spite of the low state of national finance Italy is attempting to carry out a broad program for the relief of war veterans and the unemployed by means of land reclamation and other public works.

Italy deals with its problem of war veterans through the Opera Nazionale del Combattenti, organized in December, 1917, with an initial capital of 800,000,000 lire, of which the government contributed 250,000,000. The opera has a social section for vocational training and placing, a financial section for providing credit to individual soldiers or co-operative groups, and an agricultural section, which concentrates on land reclamation.

Relief for Unemployed.

The general unemployment problem continues to be taken seriously by the government, although there is no fear now of revolutionary outbreaks as the result of the lack of work. In the last few weeks the number of unemployed has decreased slightly, but there are still more than half a million men out of work. Arrangements are almost completed for starting the public works authorized last August for the relief of the situation, but at the moment the apportioning of funds and the increase of the amount of work to be undertaken is occupying the chamber of deputies. The public works appropriation is the parliamentary pork barrel of the country.

Signor Riccio, minister of public works, is attempting to hold the balance between the deputies competing for apportionments and to protect the national budget from being swamped with more projects than it can stand. He stated in the chamber the other day that in the first three months of this year there has already been paid out for labor on public works 1,800,000,000 lire, as against 258,000,000 in the whole year of 1914. He added that although the minister of finance had authorized the expenditure of 3,000,000,000 more for public labor this year, he did not see where the money was coming from.

The grave depression in the metallurgical districts of Milan and Turin is threatening to throw more men on the streets, and as usual the condition of unemployment in the province of Emilia is widespread.

The situation in Emilia is typical of the sort of problem Italian state officials have to face. For the last 20 years the province has been greatly overpopulated, but the surplus citizens have refused to emigate. There is therefore a chronic floating population of day laborers who practically are a charge on the state.

Plans of Reclamation.

The government's policy of public works is a sound one in that the money spent constitutes an investment which in future years will more than pay for itself. Instead of providing "busy work" the ministry is carrying out a far-sighted scheme for the transformation of malarial marsh lands into fertile territory. Since 1860 the government has obtained more than 339,000,000 lire in plus value from its reclaimed lands. For this work the government spent 57,788,810 lire for reclaiming 394,027 acres, and private consortiums spent an equal amount, but recovered 394,027 acres. This year the government has appropriated 80,000,000 lire for reclamation of land in eight provinces and work began in March.

Other projects of the government are equally constructive. Roads and railways are being built in Sicily and Calabria, and in the latter province the government is building artificial lakes to store water for the hydro-electric plants in the Sila plateau. This part of the country being dry, irrigation and not draining is the problem, and the government has offered to help local irrigation consortiums by paying one-third of the cost of irrigation projects of benefit to the whole country.

Kimes Dog Returned

Fvidently the dog thieves, who stole Harve Kimes' coon dog on Sunday, November 12, got "cold feet" when the owner got hot on the trail, for it was returned Tuesday morning at about 6:30 o'clock by someone driving a Ford roadster.

Sam Kees noticed from the school house where he was about his jauitor work, a car drive north past the Kimes home and when about thirty rods north of the house it slowed up and the dog was dumped out. The car then sped on to the north out of town.

The dog wondered into the Kees yard where Mrs. Kees saw it and took it back to Mr. Kimes, thinking that it might be the lost dog. It was immediately claimed, but Mr. Kimes wonders why the one who returned it did not stop and get the $50 reward which he had offered.

Fred Saylor recovered his dog also on Tuesday morning at the E. F. Haynes dairy farm near Garrett. Mr Haynes had bought the dog of a man two weeks ago on the Tonkel road south of Garrett, for $30.

Obituary Of Late Elizabeth Ann Leighty

Elisabeth Ann Leighty, daughter of Rebecca and Henry Fales was born at Spencerville, Indiana, October 20, 1841 and died November 16, 1922 at the age of 81 years and 27 days.

She was baptized in the Lutheran faith when a young girl and remained a faithful and consistant member until the angel of death translated her from the Church Militant to the Church Triumphant. The deceased was one of ten children all preceding her in death except three brothers. Eli, Wall and Thomas Fales. She was married to William Leighty in 1861 who preceded her in death November 4, 1915. Four children were born to this union, Malcom, residing at Auburn; William, of Chicago; Edgar, of St. Joe and Mae, of Sherwood, Ohio, all living; also three granddaughters, Mrs. Ethel Cheek of Denver, Colorado, Mrs. Margaret Perry of Fort Wayne and Mrs. Marie Draggoo of St. Joe, also five great grand children.

While in failing health for some time she at no time was bedfast and it was a great shock to friends and relatives when on Thursday at 2:40 P. M., while sitting in her favorite chair, she suddenly expired at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Sam Openlander of Sherwood, O., with whom she had resided for the past six years and where she had made many friends who will sadly miss her. The remains were taken from her daughter's home on Saturday morning to the home of her son Edgar, of St. Joe, where on Sunday at 1 P. M., funeral services were held at the Lutheran Church and the remains laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery nearby.

A Light is from the household gone
A voice we loved is still.
A place is vacant in the home
That never can be filled.
They say she's dead but oh! we know
She dwells where living waters flow.

Card of Thanks

We desire to thank all our neighbors and friends for their kindness and sympathy shown us during the death of our dear mother, and for the beautiful floral offerings. We also wish to thank the choir for the beautiful songs and the ministers for their consoling words.

Edgar Leighty,
William Leighty,
Malcom Leighty,
Mrs. Sam Openlander.

* * *

Among those from out-of-town who attended the funeral were, Mr. and Mrs. William Leighty of Chicago, Mrs. Jacob Openlander and son, Mr. and Mrs. Sam Openlander, Mr. and Mrs. DeVore and Mrs. Emma Roch of Sherwood, Mr. and Mrs. Virgil Perry and Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Patterson of Fort Wayne, Mrs. Wearlidge of Garrett, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Kressley and daughter, Mrs. Ida Herrick Mrs. Minnie McNabb, Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Leighty and Mr. and Mrs. Wall Fales of Auburn.

An Appreciation

Occasionally some one is called home whose passing brings real sorrow to many outside the immediate family. Such a person was [illegible] Leighty. One of the outstanding [illegible] [illegible] words meant much to them. The above is written by one who feels he owes the deceased much for her kindness toward him and her interest in his welfare during the days of his young manhood. Surely a noble woman has passed to her reward. Four children have lost a great mother and many of us have lost a good and faithful friend.

Revival Meetings Closed

The revival meetings at the Lutheran church, conducted by the pastor, Rev. S. D. Steffy, came to a close Sunday evening. There was only one addition to the church but the pastor stated in his remarks on the last night that he would like to have had some conversions, but nevertheless he felt highly satisfied that the meeting was a grand success. The attendance every evening was exceptionally good and the spirit manifested was likewise good. He did not feel that his time was illspent. He thanked the other churches for their splendid representation at each meeting.

The Story of a Grave

By

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Copyright, 1922, by the Macmillan Co.

THERE is a place in the Great American desert where green grass grows. At the head of an estuary of the great dry sea, where a long arm of white alkali runs up among the foothills of the mountains, stands an inviting tavern. It is upon the hillside. Just below it, the garden hose and the landscape gardener, with water carried in troughs from the mountains, have wrought a miracle of green. Trees, blue-grass, flowers, wax strong and beautiful in the artificial oasis. Children and young men and maidens romp on the verdant mat, spread at the point of the estuary, and upon the hillside a score of languishing guests sit in the healing sun, and look down upon the picture, and out into the endless miles of white sand that stretch billowy and fantastic into the blue of the horizon.

Most of these idlers on the broad piazza of the tavern are invalids. It is a place of invalids. Here hundreds of wretched bodies are dragged by a tragic love of life. Here scores of souls watch other souls flicker and die out, and still hope on and wait, while the oil of life burns smudgy and low. There are those whom the sunshine and the dry, clear air win back to life. But the dead are there. On the broad veranda—a very citadel of life—the dead are embattled, fighting with time. It is a most hideous battle, and all so hushed and sepulchral are its maneuvers, that life takes no heed of the empty pageant.

Armed in such a combat sat Hawkins, the chief clerk, a grim man, dark, pallid, sinister. Of what, out in the world of life, Hawkins had been chief clerk, it does not matter now. He had been a busy man, firm, taciturn, self-contained, repellent. He sat now at his post in the battle, sneering at the folly of those about him who were trying to wrest a few mortal moments from eternity.

For a long time, as days go, Hawkins had been sitting in this sentry box, when his captain—the doctor—ordered him into the infantry, and told him to march for dear life. Hawkins left the guards upon the terrace with loathing. During the first week of his marching orders, he made exactly the same journey every day. He noticed everything along his path. He was interested in nothing. In his mind the objects he saw were catalogued, but never referred to by his memory. There was a huge bluff, a railroad bridge, a quarry, a barbed wire fence, enclosing a grave, a mud house, a herder, some sheep, a steep hill, a water trough, a cross road, and a pine grove, on the hill over which he came back to his starting point. None of these objects was dignified by a prominence in his mind. One day, attracted by the most unimportant detail in the landscape, Hawkins started to walk a few rods from his path, that he might examine more closely the grave, fenced in with barbed wire to keep the ghoulish desert beasts away. A second thought made the digression from the path the line of an ellipse, and he followed his course without veering.

There were days when Hawkins spoke to none of the hotel guests, and the lack of interest in the place weighed heavily upon him. As he sat for hours after his walks gazing between the hills that penned out the desert, the spot where the grave dotted the surface of the plain kept drawing his eyes to it, in an annoying manner.

As he took his lonely walk at the end of that fortnight, the grave began to irritate him. It aroused a certain curiosity within him, which was very distasteful.

One night, after his return from a walk, raging at his folly, the grave began to haunt his wakeful night-fancies. The next afternoon he walked over to the enclosure, thinking that he would be no longer disturbed by the thing if he examined it closely.

Hawkins saw only an adult's grave with a cactus upon it. At the head was a wooden board. At the foot was a broad peg. The barbed wire was torn away at one end—perhaps by some stray animal, wandering in the night. Hawkins did not approach nearer than a rod from the fence, and he turned quickly, as though he had overcome his weakness, when he had gathered these details in his mind.

The next day he came closer, and the day following, after a night in which he was kept awake, frenzied because of a gnawing ache to pick the cactus root out of the dead man's side. Hawkins came to the fence and leaned upon the post, looking back toward the hotel to see if the group on the veranda could see him. He did not touch the cactus, and not until he had straightened up to go did he so much as glance at the mound. He read the name on the head[illegible] hurried away with fear dogging his [illegible] [illegible] veranda when he had returned, and looked over the white floor in the distance. It seemed magnified in his eyes. He fancied he could distinguish the headboard from the fence. Then he began to fight with the spell. He reasoned that it was an accident, and it came over him with a chill, that he had been drawn to the place by an irresistible force. At this conclusion he smiled sardonically and lighted a cigar.

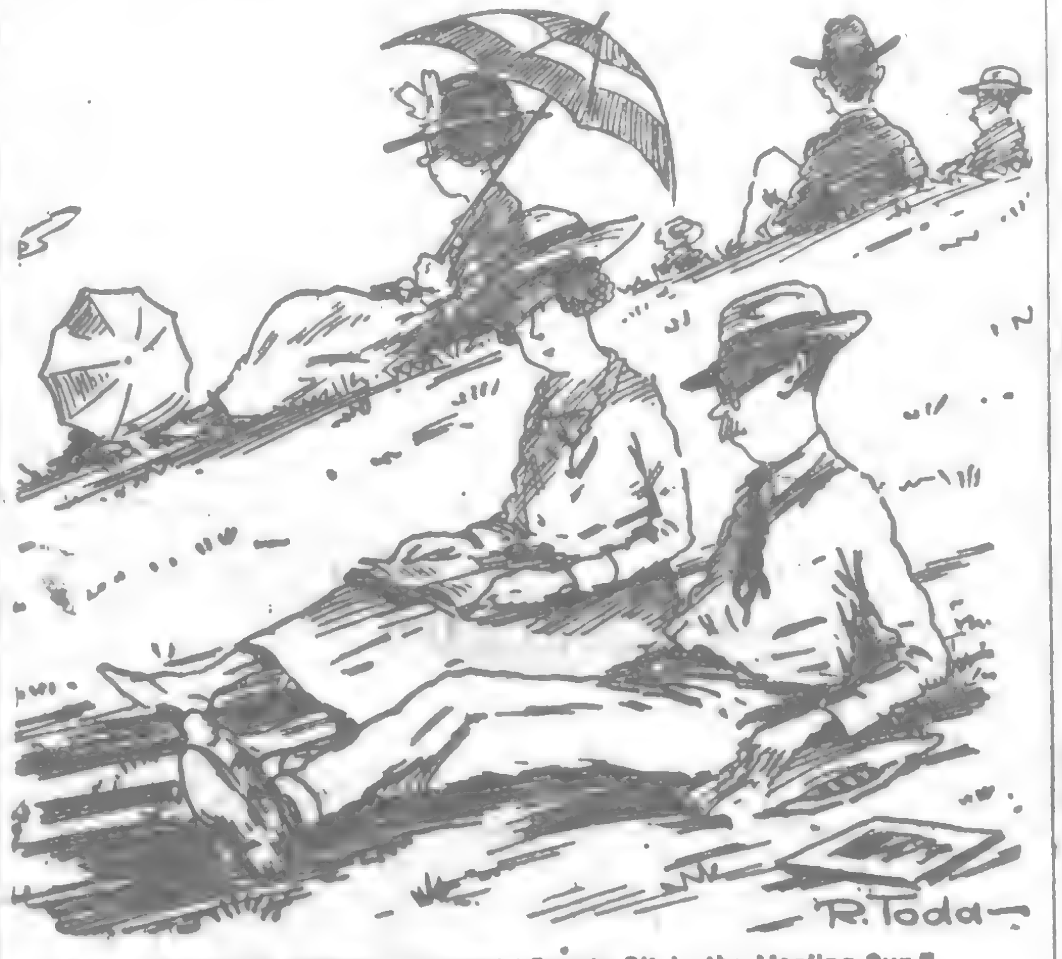
He believed he had conquered the hallucination by giving it full rein. Then he began to hate his old enemy. Hawkins had not known that the man was dead until that day. He mused pleasurably upon the cactus. The doctor, seeing Hawkins in the sunset air with a cigar, swore at him, and the grim man went indoors. He was proud to be alive. His pride amounted almost to a thrill.

Hawkins went to sleep early that night. When the lights in the hotel were extinguished he wakened from a dream about figures and business, and felt that there was something important on his mind. Then he remembered the discovery on the headboard. He trailed over his treasure with the harrow of his hate. He tried to think of something else; he began counting, finally it came. A sentence formed in his mind: "Was it the dead man's spirit?"

When he aroused himself his mouth was dry, and he was wet with perspiration. Hawkins' normal mind then took control of his fancy and his hate for the conquered foe burned fiercely. The woman kept coming into his malignant speculations. He wondered if she had taken the man's name. He was curious to know if she had come with his enemy into the desert where he died. Hawkins pictured them together on the terrace. Then his sick fancy painted them in the very room where he was lying. For a moment he was in mental hell. A footfall startled him. He sprang to the floor to ring the bell and to ascertain if his imaginings had any foundation in fact. When the boy came Hawkins asked for ice water, and upon getting it sipped it, as he stood looking out at the quiet stars and the moon, and listening to the sheep-bells and to the dogs barking out on the floor of the desert, beyond the grave. This soothed him, and he slept.

The day following that night, and for many days thereafter, Hawkins stood gazing at the ugly sand heap in its barbed wire prison, exulting in his heart at the dead man's desolation. The moments he spent thus were almost happy ones for the grim man. His fancy made morbid pictures; and the figures of the man and woman danced before his eyes in a thousand horrid day-dreams. Once he kicked the headboard and sneered at himself for so doing. Then Hawkins saw how like a cur he was.



"Upon the Hillside Languid Guests Sit in the Healing Sun."

After that there were three in his circle of hate.

One day, loathing himself, he began to wonder what had ever induced the woman to promise to love and honor him. He recalled cowardly words he had spoken to her. Revelations of his own cruelty and meanness were made to him, and ghostly memories that he had strangled years before came flitting back.

He was oppressed with a sense of having done a terrible wrong. The face of the woman whom he had forgotten, rose and floated on his stagnant fancies. Dialogues, that he had crowded into what seemed to him oblivion, came trooping back, and whispered themselves into his ear. In each of these pictures and voices he saw his own selfishness. Hawkins began to know himself as he was known. A love that he had trampled out with his physical heel in a fit of rage, began to glow and warm his being.

A miracle was wrought on the day that a [illegible] tear [illegible] in his eye. He went to the grave and stood a longer time than usual [illegible] could know of the softening of his heart. The visits to the grave grew necessary to his happiness. For the first time in his life Hawkins felt as desolate as he really was. He visited the grave, as a man of ordinary temperament would call upon a comrade. When his strength permitted a trip every other day, only, he sat in his room looking out between the hills at the plain, and at the fascinating dot upon the white stretch of sand and alkali.

It was at these times that Hawkins began to try to recall the possible good qualities of his dead enemy. Hawkins remembered how he had condemned the man out of hand, when his name was first brought up because Thweke wrote a copybook hand. Hawkins remembered that he had sneered at the man on account of a certain curl of the mustache; and that the fellow had incurred a husbandly hate, by knowing how to play the piano. Remembering these prejudices, Hawkins tried to make some entries on the other side of the account.

As the Shadow flitted nearer and nearer to the grim man, now confined to his barren room more closely than before, he began to lose the horror he once felt at what he fancied might be the presence of the dead. One day he found himself curiously listening to some token from the dead man in the grave. His mood was not one of horror, but of longing. He reasoned that his strange finding of the grave, the inexplicable power that drew him against his will and against his nature to the lonely spot, and the influence which it had wrought upon his life indicated the presence of some outside power. He built up a theory of hypnotism from disembodied spirits, and sat watching for a signal to verify through his material senses the existence of the supernatural force with which his spirit seemed to have been communing. In this frame of mind he forgot the wasting of the flesh. He sat by his window, overlooking the desert, and mused by the hour upon life and the coming of the end. His whole being was softened by the approaching dissolution of his body.

He longed for some sign that would tell him that he had fellowship—real and palpable—with the spirit of the man in the deserted grave. But the sign did not come. He traced false signs to their natural causes, and was sad. The habit of a lifetime, as a scoffer, strangled credulity, even though it was the child of hope. So Hawkins sat in the silence, listening and waiting for the greater silence.

There came a time when he rallied—when he left the window for the veranda. Then it was that a great yearning came to his heart to go and lie prone upon the grave and to be as simple as a child in grief. He could not explain this yearning; he did not try to analyze it. He felt some way that it was a thing the woman would have done, and the desire became a master passion. It seemed cold to him on the porch; but out on the desert the sun shone gayly and seductively. Day after day he walked the length of the veranda. He seemed to be gaining strength. There was a day when he walked the entire distance around the hotel twice, without sitting or resting. It was a day of triumph. That night he planned his journey to the fence and the mound between the foothills.

His mental strain brought a slight relapse in his malady. He did not notice it the next morning. He kept his plans to himself. That afternoon he slipped away. Slowly, slowly, he crept down the terraces. He sat down often by the wayside. A notion that he was making a pilgrimage that she—Hawkins only thought of the woman as "she," now—would have him make, warmed something in his grim heart, not unlike a tenderness. He was very weak, and [illegible] were loose.

Gramont frowned. "What has that got to do with our present business?"

"Quite a bit, I fancy." A thin smile curved the lips of Jachin Fell. "Maillard is not guilty of the murder—but you are."

"Liar!" Gramont started from his chair as these three words burned into him. "Liar! Why, you know that I went home—"

"Ah, wait!" Fell lifted his hand for peace. His voice was calm. "Ansley and I both saw you depart, certainly. We have since learned that you did not reach home until some time after midnight. You have positively no alibi, Gramont. You may allege, of course, that you were wandering the streets—"

"As I was!" cried Gramont, heatedly.

"Then prove it, my dear fellow; prove it—if you can. Now, we shall keep Lucie out of all this. What remains? I know that you were the Midnight Masquer. My man, Ben Chacherre, can prove by another man who accompanied him that the Masquer's loot was taken from your car. A dictograph in the private office, yonder, has a record of the talk between us of the other morning, in which you made patent confession to being the Masquer.

"Once let me hand this array of evidence over to the district attorney, and you will most certainly stand trial. And, if you do stand trial, I can promise you faithfully that you will meet conviction. I have friends, you see, and many of them are influential in such small matters."

It was not a nice smile that curved the lips of Fell.

Gramont choked back any response, holding himself to silence with a firm will. He dared say nothing, lest he say too much. He saw that Fell could indeed make trouble for him—and that he must strike his own blow at Fell without great delay. It was a battle, now; a fight to the end.

Fell regarded Gramont cheerfully, seeming to take this crushed silence as evidence of his own triumph.

"Further," he added, "your man Hammond is now in jail at Houma, as you know, for the murder of the sheriff. Now, my influence is not confined to this city, Gramont; I may be able to clear Hammond of this charge—if you decide to vote with me. I may keep what I know about the Midnight Masquer from the press and from the district attorney—if you decide to vote with me. You comprehend?"

Gramont nodded. He saw now why Fell wanted to "get something" on Hammond. Fell had rightly reasoned that Gramont would do more to save Hammond than to save himself.

"You think I murdered Maillard, then?" he asked.

"Gramont, I don't know what to think, and that's the honest truth!" answered Fell, with a steady regard. "But I am absolutely determined to put this oil deal across, to make Lucie Ledanois at least independent, if not wealthy. I can do it, I've made all my plans to do it, and—I will do it!

"We'll hold another meeting day after tomorrow—Saturday morning." Fell rose. "That will give me time to conclude all arrangements. I trust, Mr. Gramont, that you will vote with me for the adjournment?"

"Yes," said Gramont, dully. "I will."

"Thank you," and Jachin Fell bowed slightly, not without a trace of mockery in his air.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Coin Falls Heads.

Gramont sat in his own room that afternoon. It seemed to him that he had been away from the city for weeks and months. Yet only a day had intervened. He sat fingering the only piece of mail that had come to him—a notice from the post of the American Legion which he had joined, to the effect that there would be a meeting that Thursday evening. Only Thursday! And tomorrow was Friday.

If he was to effect anything against the headquarters of Fell's gang he must act on the morrow or not at all. Gumberts was to be out there tomorrow. Gumberts would talk with the ratty little man of the projecting teeth and adenoids, would find Gramont had imposed upon the fellow, and there would be upheavals. The gang would take to flight, certainly, or at least make certain that Gramont's mouth was shut.

He sat fingering the postal from the Legion, and turning over events in his mind. Against Fell he had no particular animosity. All that the little gray man had done had been done with the thought of Lucie Ledanois as a spur.

"If I'm to strike a blow, I'll have to do it tomorrow—before noon tomorrow, also. I'll have to leave here mighty early, and get there before Gumberts does. What was it Hammond said that day about him—that nobody in the country had ever caught Memphis Izzy? I bet I could do it, and his whole gang with him—if I knew how. There's the rub! Fell won't hesitate a minute in having me arrested. And as he said, once he got me arrested, I'd be gone. He [illegible] be able to exert a powerful influence [illegible]."

[illegible]

Gramont was still pondering this dilemma when Ben Chacherre arrived.

Gramont heard the man's voice on the stairs. Ben's impudence, perhaps added to his name and the Creole French upon his lips, had carried him past the concierge unannounced, although not without a continued exchange of repartee that served to give Gramont warning of the visitor. Smiling grimly, Gramont drew a coin from his pocket, and flipped it.

The coin fell heads. He pocketed it again as Ben Chacherre knocked, and opened the door.

"Ah, Chacherre!" he exclaimed. "Come in."

Ben swaggered inside and closed the door.

"Brought a message for you, Mr. Gramont," he said, jauntily, and extended a note.

Gramont tore open the envelope and read a curt communication:

"Kindly let me know your answer as soon as possible. By tomorrow evening at latest. It will be necessary to arrange affairs for Saturday.

"JACHIN FELL."

To arrange affairs! Fell was taking for granted that Gramont would give an assent, under force of persuasion, to the scheme. He would probably have everything in readiness, and if assured by Friday night of Gramont's assent, would then pull his strings and perhaps complete the whole deal before the following Monday.

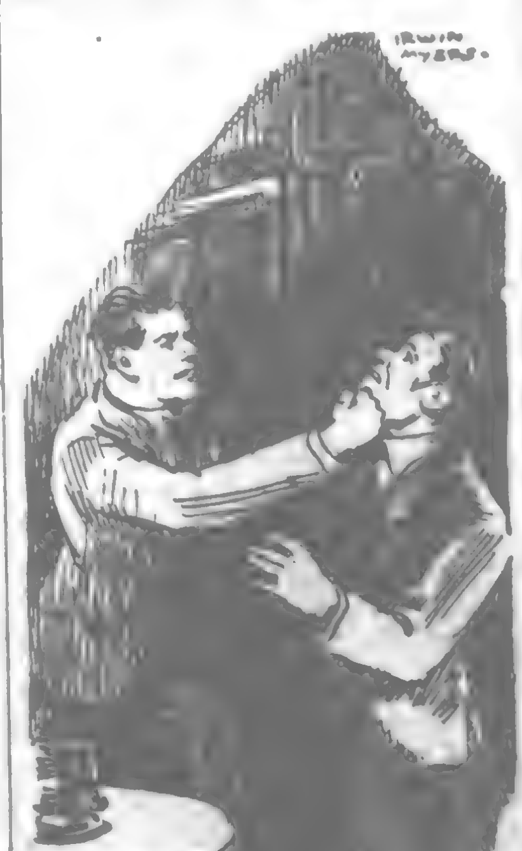
The meeting of the company had been adjourned to Saturday morning. Gramont thought a moment, then went to his buhl escritoire and opened it. Chacherre had already taken a seat. Gramont wrote:

"My Dear Mr. Fell:

"If you will arrange the company meeting for tomorrow evening, say nine o'clock, at your office, I think that everything may then be arranged. As I may not see Miss Ledanois in the meantime, will you be kind enough to assure her presence at the meeting?"

He addressed an envelope to Fell's office, and then stamped and pocketed it.

"Well, Chacherre," he said, rising and returning to the Creole, "any further news from Houma? They haven't found the real murderer yet?"



As He Did So, Gramont's Fist Caught Him Squarely on the Point of the Jaw.

The other came to his feet with an exclamation of surprise. As he did so, Gramont's fist caught him squarely on the point of the jaw.

Chacherre crumpled back across his chair, senseless for the moment.

"I'm afraid to take any chances with you, my fine bird," said Gramont, rubbing his knuckles. "You're too clever by far, and too handy with your weapons."

He obtained cloths, and firmly bound the ankles and wrists of Chacherre. Not content with this, he placed the man in the chair and tied him to it with merciless knots. As he was finishing his task, Chacherre opened his eyes and gazed dazedly around.

"Awake at last, are you?" said Gramont, genially. He got his pipe, filled and lighted it. The eyes of Chacherre were now fastened upon him venomously. "To bad for you, Chacherre, that the coin fell heads up! That spelled action."

"Are you crazy?" muttered the other in French. Gramont [illegible], and responded in the same tongue.

"It does look that way, doesn't it? You're slippery, but now you're caught."

Chacherre must have realized that he stood in danger. He [illegible] a curse, and [illegible] Gramont with a steady [illegible].

"Be careful!" he said, his voice [illegible]. "What do you mean to [illegible]?"

Gramont looked at him and puffed his pipe.

"The game's up, Ben," he observed. "I [illegible] of four Thursdays, you fool! So you know about things, eh? My master will soon shut your mouth!"

[illegible]

"So?" queried Gramont, his brows lifted. "You seem much in Mr. Fell's confidence, Ben. But I think I'll leave you tied up a little while. Memphis Izzy is going down to his summer cottage tomorrow, isn't he? I'll be there—but you won't. By the way, I think I'd better look through your pockets."

Ben Chacherre writhed suddenly, hurling a storm of curses at Gramont.

The latter, unheeding the contortions of his captive, searched the man thoroughly. Except for a roll of money, the pockets gave up little of interest. The only paper Gramont secured was a fresh telegraph blank. He would have passed this unheeded had he not noted a snaky flitting of Chacherre's eyes to it.

"Ah!" he said, pleasantly. "You appear to be interested in this, Ben. Pray, what is the secret?"

Chacherre merely glared at him, and a sudden exclamation broke from him. He held the bit of yellow paper to the light at varying angles.

"It's the most natural thing in the world," he said after a moment, "for a man to walk into a telegraph office, write out a telegram, and then find that he's torn two blanks instead of one from the pad on the desk. Eh? I've done it, often—and I've always put the extra blank into my pocket, Ben, thinking it might come in handy; just as you did, eh? Now, let's see!

"You were excited when you wrote this, weren't you? You'd just thought of something very important, and you took care of it hurriedly—that made you jab down your pencil pretty hard. Who's Dick Hearne at Houma? An agent of the gang there?"

Chacherre merely glared, sullenly defiant. Word by word, Gramont made out the message:

"Burn bundle under rear seat my car. Have done at once."

Gramont looked up and smiled thinly.

"Your car? Why, you left it in the garage at Gumberts' place, eh? That little roadster of Fell's, with the extra seat behind. If you'd been just a little bit cooler yesterday, Ben, you would have made fewer mistakes. It never occurred to you that other people might have been there in the bushes when the sheriff was murdered, eh?"

Chacherre went livid.

"It was another mistake to throw away your knife after you killed him," pursued Gramont, reflectively. "You should have held on to that knife, Ben. There's no blood, remember, on Hammond's knife—a hard thing for you and your friends to explain plausibly. Yet your knife is heavy with blood, which tests will show to be human blood. Also, the knife has your name on it; quite a handsome knife, too. On the whole, you must admit that you bungled the murder from start to finish—"

Chacherre broke in with a frightful oath—a frantically obscene storm of curses. So furious were his words that Gramont very efficiently gagged him with cloths, gagged him hard and fast.

"I think that I'll send another wire to Dick Hearne on this blank which you so thoughtfully provided. I'll order him, in your name, not to burn that bundle after all; I fancy it may prove of some value to me. And I'll also tell your friend—I suppose he has some familiar cognomen, such as Slippery Dick—to meet Henry Gramont at Houma early in the morning. I'd like to gather Dick in with the other gentlemen. I'll mention that you were kind enough to supply a few names and incidents."

At this last Ben Chacherre writhed anew, for it was a shrewd blow. He and his friends belonged to that class of crook which never "peaches." If by any mischance one of that class is jailed and convicted, he invariably takes his medicine silently, knowing that the whole gang is behind him, and that when he emerges from prison he will be sure to find money and friends and occupation awaiting him.

To know that he would be placed, in the estimation of the gang, in the same class with stool-pigeons, must have bitten deeper into Ben Chacherre than any other lash.

Gramont, meantime, was writing out the telegram to Dick Hearne. This finished, he got his hat and coat, and from the bureau drawer took an automatic pistol, which he pocketed. Then he smiled pleasantly at his prisoner.

"This evening, Ben, I think that I'll attend a meeting of my post of the American Legion. You don't belong to that organization by any chance? No, I'm quite sure you don't. Very few of your exclusive acquaintances do belong. Well, see you later! Work on those bonds all you like—you're quite safe. I'm curious to see what is in that bundle under the rear seat of your car; I have an idea that it may prove interesting. Good afternoon!"

Gramont closed the door, and left the house.

Going downstairs, he mailed the letter to Fell [illegible]

Chef Had Plenty But He Could Hardly Eat

Even an expert chef for an up-to-date restaurant, with everything heart could wish in the eating line and the skill to prepare it in the most appetizing manner, finds life miserable and work a burden with his appetite gone and his health all broken up on account of stomach trouble.

According to his own statement, such had been the case for two years with William Lackey, 865 North Wells St., Chicago, Ill., chef at a popular North Clark St. restaurant, who says he recently found relief by taking Tanlac.

Mr. Lackey now boasts of a "wonderful appetite and a stomach that digests such things as ham and eggs, corned beef and cabbage, and rich pastries, foods that would have almost put me out of commission before I took Tanlac."

"Before I ran across this medicine," said he, "I was having to lay off from my work for a week at a time just on account of the numerous ills I suffered from indigestion. But when I tell you I have gained fifteen pounds, eat and digest anything, and am on the job every day feeling fine, you may know how I appreciate Tanlac."

Tanlac is sold by all good druggists.—Advertisement.

TROUBLE WAS NOT PHYSICAL

Lady's Apparent Suffering Merely the Result of Her Hands Being Temporarily Occupied.

Passers-by stopped and looked. The lady's face was writhing as if she was in terrible agony. Her mouth worked up and down and she seemed to be suppressing shrieks of pain. Then a girl acquaintance approached hurriedly and gazed at her face.

"Why," she exclaimed, "what on earth is the matter?"

The twitchings ceased and a sweet smile took their place.

"With me?" inquired the sufferer. "Why nothing."

"But you look ill," said the girl. "Your face—it loked as if you were in dreadful pain."

The lady held out her hands. In one was a paper parcel, in the other her umbrella.

"I was only trying," she explained, "to work the edge of my veil down over my chin, dear."

Youth's Grace Before Meal Certainly Savored Strongly of the Correspondence School.

Roberts is a correspondence specialist. He writes letters for a large wholesale house eight hours a day. A few days ago he was dining at the home of a friend. As they sat down to the meal he was unexpectedly called upon to say grace. This was something Roberts had never done, but he prided himself on never saying that he could not do a thing. So, after a moment's hesitation, he plunged into the prayer:

"We acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your favors of this date, O Lord," he began. "Permit us to express our gratitude at this evidence of thy good will. May we merit the confidence thus shown in us, while at the same time trusting to receive more favors in the future. Amen."—Kansas City Star.

An Admirable Attribute.

"Can you mention even one good result produced by jazz?" we sternly demanded.

"Certainly!" replied Uncle Fogy. "Jazz renders professional musicians so furious that temporarily, at least, they forget to strut and pose and tell how good they are."—Kansas City Star.

WILLING TO DO HIS SHARE

Jack Dempsey's Really Amusing Story of Irishman Made a Hit With English Hosts.

Jack Dempsey's recent visit to London was a brief one but it afforded him time enough to establish a brilliant reception as an after-dinner speaker. Several London newspapers, in fact, declared him to be a better after-dinner speaker than Chauncey Depew or James Russell Lowell.

Jack made his reputation at a luncheon given in his honor by Lord Northcliffe. All England's greatest statesmen, artists and millionaires were gathered round the board. When the young champion was called on for a toast he rose and said:

"I am a good deal like the Irishman who attended a dinner where every guest had to make a speech, sing a song or tell a story. When the Irishman's turn came he got up and said: "'I can't make a speech, or sing a song, or tell a story, but I'll fight any man in the room.'"

Few Women Inventors.

Only 297 of the 35,132 inventors who last year applied to the patent office for protection are women. The year before the proportion was much the same. Officials do not remember a single instance of a striking invention by a woman.

How much sleep do you need?

It isn't so much a question of the number of hours you spend in bed, as it is of the quality of the sleep you get. Is your sleep sound and restful, or is it fitful and unrefreshing?

One common cause of wakefulness at night is over-stimulation from coffee drinking. For coffee contains caffeine which irritates the nerves and frequently leads to insomnia.

If you have any idea that coffee keeps you awake at night, or makes you nervous, make a change from coffee to delicious Postum.

This pure cereal beverage contains nothing that can harm health, and its flavor is much like coffee. In fact, many people prefer Postum for its flavor alone.

Your grocer sells Postum in two forms: Instant Postum (in tins) prepared instantly in the cup by the addition of boiling water. [illegible]

The two forms of Postum are equally delicious; and the cost is only about ½c per cup.

1923 Auto Plates Ready By Dec. 15

The 1923 auto license plates for Indiana will be white lettered on a brown background. Officials say that next year there will be no necessity of car owners using the old cardboard sign, "License applied for," for the Automobile License Department is getting ready for the 1923 rush.

The new plates are now ready and are being distributed to the twenty-six branch offices of the State Automobile Department outside of the capital city. In order to facilitate the issuance of license H. D. McClelland, manager of the department, is planning to have a branch station in every county next year. The branch stations are usually maintained in garages, banks or automobile dealers' offices.

In size the plate for the coming year will be slightly larger than they are this year, by two and one-half inches each way.

The cost of issuing each plate is approximately 22 1-3 cents, including the cost of manufacture. The net profit to the department for the first six months of the coming year was $2,674,000, according to Mr. McClellen. The fees range from $5 to $7 a car. The numbers in thousands on the new plates are divided by a dash in order to make them easily readable.

THE END OF A PROFITABLE DAY

On Thursday, October 19th, I had the opportunity of visiting two of our neighboring high schools, namely, Butler and Auburn. I took this opportunity and have not regretted it as I received an idea of how a larger H. S. than my own is conducted.

We arrived at the Auburn H. S. building before school had begun, thus giving us a chance to observe the pupils when not on their good behavior. It was rather bewildering to one not accustomed to so much confusion to look over the big hall and see so many human beings moving to and fro. At the ring of a gong we found ourselves alone in the hall. At Butler the same confusion was seen.

There were about twenty-five in each class, but they seemed unusually quiet. Whether it was the customary thing or because there were visitors in the room, I do not know. The teachers seemed efficient and conducted the classes in an orderly and practical manner.

I visited an English class at Auburn in which the supervised study method is used. In this special class the teacher was grading papers, with the pupil whose paper she was grading watching her. In this way each pupil was told their particular mistakes, thus giving them a better chance for improvement. The remainder of the class were studying the next day's lesson.

Of all the classes which I visited I enjoyed the physical training class the most. The exercises that day was the game "leap frog." It was certainly interesting to watch the fun and rivalary beween the two rows of girls.

The French class was a novel experience. Of course, it was all unfamliar to me, nevertheless, I enjoyed it to the utmost.

At the conclusion of the history class which I visited, the teacher asked a student what he had learned that day. This gave an opportunity for a brief summary of the lesson and served to stamp it more indelibly on the memory.

At the close of a perfect day, as I reflected on the pleasures and profitable experiences which the day had brought, I concluded that I was well satisfied with my own little school and that I would not exchange it for any other.

—Evelyn Knight.

High School Notes

GENERAL:

Mr. Kinsey made a loan of one of his new Columbia's to us to start our Music Memory programs. One of our most urgent needs at the present time is a good machine and some of the records included in this contest.

With the consent of the editor of The News, we shall publish from week to week, a short list of records needed in the school. Perhaps some of these may be located in the community, worn and discarded, but still of some little worth to us. If you should not care to part with them permanently, a loan of two or three weeks would be appreciated. There are fifty selections in the Memory list We have access to about half of them at the presens time.

A like list of books will be published on the same conditions, that a donation would be highly appreciated, but a loan would be satisfactory. Book list: Story of My Life by Helen Keller; Robison Crusoe; The Crisis. Records, March Militaire; To a Wild Rose; Sping Song.

CLASS NOTES

FRESHMEN:

We may be a group of meek and lowly Freshmen but that is no sign that we are willing to swallow what the Sophs said about us, in this column of last week's issue.

This morning Miss Moore sent to town for ten cans of Baking Powder. We wonder if she cannot rise in life without the assistance of some such ingredient. If such is the case we would suggest that she use the much advertised yeast cake.

We are working on a new and difficult phase of our Eglish work. By keeping in a good humor our teacher is making the difficult work more easy.

Hilda to Miss Schmalzried after English class. "Do you think it is all right for a girl to be a tom-boy?" "Yes, to a certain extent. I sometimes like to be one myself. W.L.B.

SOPHOMORE:

At a recent class meeting the class colors were changed from silver, gold and blue to purple and white; the class flower was changed from the hyacinth to the aster. The class motto is as follows: "No Victory Without Labor."

This morning only a few of the Caesar class were permitted to recite.

Because of the low deportment grades we expect to have a "clean up" of class officers. All class officers must meet certain requirments in school work and deportment as well. L. E. K.

JUNIOR:

Come, laugh and learn Friday night, December 1, at the Christian Church. Irvine Lenroot, U. S. Senator, Wis., has the following to say for Mr. Laird's ability: "I have heard Mr. Laird's Chautauqua entertainments and always with keen pleasure. His convincing argumente are always brightened by a touch of humor. He is a veritable dynamo of wit and logic, and magnetizes his hearers with his entertaining eloquence." We are very fortunate in securing a man of this reputation, therefore we feel that he is worthy of the patronage o the public.—Adv.

Blue Monday had a serious effect on the Junior and Senior English class. The teacher, after discovering that the majority of the class were not prepared, ceased reciting and told the class to study. A spell of magic seemed to come over us and the room was exceedingly quiet for the remainder of the period. R. J.

SENIOR:

In Civics Class: Mr. Maxwell: "Charles, what does Vocational Education mean?" Charles Miser: "I——I think it means a school where they study singing" Evidently Charles did not study his lesson. R. W.

Fine Place to Keep Your Automobile

Is your garage frost proof or does your radiator freeze up the first frosty morning in the fall? Of course you can't keep out the cold in the dead of the winter without extra heat of some kind. It won't cost much to line your garage with beaver board and this will not only help a lot to keep the temperature up but will make your garage look like something inside, and while you are doing this you can put in a few neat cupbords around the wall to put tires and tubes and parts and robes and all the other things that you want when you want them. A little thought along this line will develop a lot of conveniences.

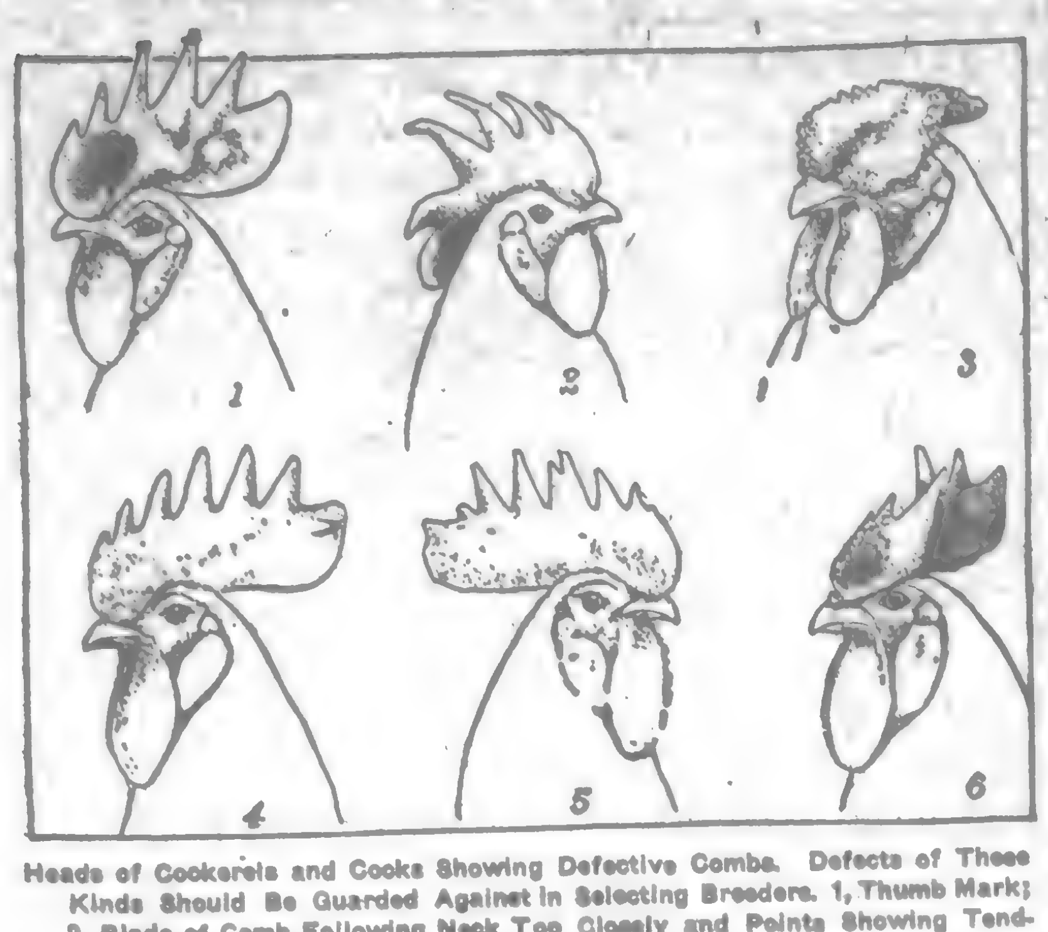
BREEDING FLOCK DOES BEST IF PERMITTED FREE RUN OF RANGE



Heads of Cockerels and Cocks Showing Defective Combs. Defects of These Kinds Should Be Guarded Against in Selecting Breeders. 1, Thumb Mark; 2, Blade of Comb Following Neck Too Closely and Points Showing Tendency to Lop; 3, Rose Comb Showing Hollow Center; 4, Side Sprig; 5, Uneven Serrations and Double Point; 6, Twisted Comb.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

If cockerels or pullets are used in the breeding flock they should be well matured, poultry specialists in the United States Department of Agriculture advise. Hens are better than pullets. They lay larger eggs, which produce stronger chicks. Yearling and two-year-old hens are better than older ones. Pullets used as breeders should be mated with a cock rather than with a cockerel. If a cockerel is used he should be mated with hens rather than with pullets. As a rule, well-matured cockerels will give better fertility than cocks.

Free Range for Breeding Pen.

When possible free range should be provided for the breeding stock. It is better to provide it during the entire fall and winter before the breeding season, but, if this is not possible, free range just preceding and during the breeding season will be of great value. Birds of free range will get more exercise and, therefore, will be in better health and will give higher fertility, better hatches, and stronger chicks.

The breeding flock needs careful supervision to make sure that the fowls keep in good breeding condition. The birds and the houses should be examined often to see that they are not infested with lice or mites. Either of these pests in any numbers will seriously affect or totally destroy fertility. Care must be exercised also to see that the male does not frost his comb or wattles. If these are frosted his ability to fertilize eggs will be impaired and may not be recovered for several weeks. On very cold nights when there is danger of the combs being frosted the males to be used as breeders must be put in a warm place, such as a box or crate of suitable size partly covered by a bag or cloth. The breeding male should be examined occasionally after feeding to see that his crop is full and that he is not growing thin. Some males will allow the hens to eat all the feed, with the result that they get out of condition. If this happens the male must be fed separately from the hens at least once a day.

Provide the breeding stock with comfortable quarters. The house must be draft proof, yet well ventilated and dry. The birds should not be crowded. If the birds are yarded, four square feet of floor space per bird should be allowed, but on free range from three to three and a half square feet per bird will be enough.

Feeding Breeding Stock.

The breeders must be fed so as to keep them in such condition that they will produce eggs. Any good laying ration is suitable for this purpose. Beef scrap should not run above 10 or 15 per cent of the total ration. The birds should be kept in good flesh, but should not be allowed to become excessively fat. All whole or cracked grain should be fed in litter. This forces the fowls to exercise by scratching for it. As a supply of green feed is usually lacking late in the winter or early in the spring, sprouted oats, cabbage, mangels, or cut clover or alfalfa should be fed.

HARD TO MAKE TEST OF BLUEGRASS SEED

Has Been Giving Dealers and Experts Much Trouble.

Great Variation in Behavior of Various Samples Has Been Found in Germinating Tests Made by Department.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Canada bluegrass seed seems to be extremely sensitive to a number of conditions that affect its germination and for that reason the United States Department of Agriculture is trying to develop a method for testing it that will give uniform results. Up to the present time blue grass seed has been giving seed dealers and state analysts much trouble.

The department, in its attempt to determine the factors influencing the germination of Canada bluegrass, has found a great variation in the behavior of various samples. All samples are found to require a daily alternation of temperatures for successful germination. A temperature of 20 degrees C. for 18 hours and 30 degrees C. for six hours is satisfactory. Many samples give a distinctly higher germination when exposure to light is added to the above temperature schedule. However, it is important that the temperature schedule be not sacrificed in obtaining the light exposure.

Some samples of Canada bluegrass do not germinate completely even with the above conditions satisfied. Work in progress is expected to determine all the factors necessary to make a dependable germination test of Canada bluegrass possible.

BILLION FOR ROADS

States and counties of the United States have recently authorized $635,000,000 bonds for road construction, much of it of concrete. Three hundred and ninety-one million dollars bonds are in process of authorization and the federal government has appropriated $200,000,000 toward road construction, making a total fund of over $1,200,000,000 for good roads.

BEST SELF-FEEDER FOR PIGS

Small Device Is Handier to Move Around and Takes Up Less Room in the Feed Alley.

The small self-feeder is much handier to move around and also stands the moving much better than the large one. It takes up less room when placed in the feed alley of the hog house or in some other sheltering building, and is safer to feed from. Any feeder is apt to clog up occasionally, especially in feeding ground feed, and for that reason they should be looked after often. The larger the feeder the stronger is the tendency to let it take care of itself.

From the standpoint of construction the advantage is also in favor of the small feeder. With a length of much over four feet the load on it will be heavy and the strain of moving it will tell much sooner than on the smaller size. Many good types of ready-made self-feeders can be bought today, and if the freight on them has not been too high they should be had almost as cheaply as they can be made.

Besides the widow, ten children survive. The amount of the award was reached by agreement out of court.

Marion.—As a result of the decision of Walter Bent, special judge, deciding in favor of the city in the injunction suit to prohibit the city from interferring with the new taxicab ordinance the city is now free to enforce the terms of the ordinance. By its provisions taxicabs are prohibited from taking on or discharging passengers on the same streets on which street cars run, and in addition must pay a high license fee.

Greensburg.—The largest yield of corn reported in Decatur county was raised this year by Arthur C. Stewart on his farm northeast of this city. His field, which was entered in the five-acre corn contest, produced 117.26 bushels an acre. The corn is of Reed's Yellow Dent variety. Mr. Stewart said he increased the yield at least 15 per cent by seed testing.

Jeffersonville.—Farmers in this vicinity assert that although they are willing to pay good prices, they can hardly get labor for shucking corn. They are offering 25 cents a shock for light fields and 30 cents for heavy fields, which means earnings from $2 to $2.50 a day and as high as $3 in some cases.

Jeffersonville.—Lillian May Holsclaw, age four, granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Metcalfe, of Jeffersonville, is dead of starvation. The child accidentally drank lye water three years ago and became sick a week later. She was sick intermittently for two years, and in the last six months starved to death because of her inability to swallow.

Gary.—The police have been unable to find Herbert Plowman, a Gary grocer, who disappeared after leaving a Gary bank. Plowman had been sick and last summer suffered a lapse of memory. Mr. Chambers was sent to the senate from the district composed of Henry and Madison counties.

Evansville.—The Chrisney Sun, at Chrisney, has been sold by John P. Chrisney to H. C. Bolin. Mr. Chrisney started the Sun 38 years ago, and the paper is widely known in southern Indiana. The Sun is independent in politics and no change in policy is expected.

Noblesville.—George W. Reddick, a young farmer living near this city, husked 168 bushels of corn in nine hours on the farm of Mark Pettigrew. In addition to his day's wage, Mr. Pettigrew gave him $10 in gold for his effort to break a record.

Mr. Taylor assured Mr. Johnson that the farmer's federation will use its influence to persuade congressmen and senators from Indiana to favor a speedy completion of the Ohio river improvement work.

Goshen.—In Circuit court here John H. Reid, who had been employed as a deputy in the sheriff's office, was sentenced to the Indiana State Farm for four months and was fined $100 on his plea of guilty to removing mortgaged furniture from the state. Roy Higgs, age twenty-two of Mishawaka who pleaded guilty of stealing a horse and buggy belonging to John Ware of Goshen from the Elkhart county fairground, was sentenced to the Indiana reformatory for from one to fourteen years.

Wabash.—If the federal government enforces its order and collects the $2,000 penalty provided for failure to pay a tax of $12.80 on each gallon of intoxicating liquor manufactured, it will receive $64,000 from Wabash county, court records show. Since the federal prohibition law became effective 32 persons have been fined for manufacturing and selling intoxicating liquor.

Gary.—Announcement that the Gary syndicate which controls and operates the Calumet Electric company has also acquired ownership and control of the Wanatah-Lacrosse Electric company, which covers the entire eastern part of Laporte county, means that Gary will become the headquarters and center of one of the largest electric lighting and power systems in Indiana.

LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 26

JESUS THE GREAT MISSIONARY

LESSON TEXT—Luke 8:1-39.

GOLDEN TEXT—The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which is lost.—Luke 19:10.

REFERENCE MATERIAL—Matt. 4:23; 9:35-38.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Brings a Little Girl Back to Life.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus the Great Missionary.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Jesus Meeting All Human Needs.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Jesus the Ideal Missionary.

I. The Great Missionary's Field (vv. 1-3).

He went throughout every city and village. The true missionary goes to everybody, for all need the gospel.

1. His Message (v. 1). He preached the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. The gospel message is truly good tidings, for the great King is offering to rebellious sinners salvation through Jesus Christ.

2. His Helpers (v. 1.) The twelve apostles were with Him. The missionary should utilize the help of others.

3. Supported by Saved Women (vv. 2, 3). Out of grateful hearts certain women who had experienced the saving power of the gospel ministered unto Jesus of their substance.

II. The Great Missionary Teaching (vv. 4-21).

1. The Parable of the Sower (vv. 4-21.). (1) the sower—Jesus (see Matt. 13:27). (2) The seed—the Word of God (v. 11). (3) The kinds of ground (vv. 5-8). (a) Wayside (v. 5). This foot-trodden path pictures the hard-hearted upon which no impression can be made. The preached word finds no entrance, and Satan snatches it away as birds pick up the grain from the hard-beaten path." In such cases faith cannot spring up and result in salvation (v. 12). (b) Stony ground (v. 6). This is not stones mixed with earth, but a thin layer of earth on a ledge of rock. The seed falling upon such earth springs up quickly, but the plant soon dies when exposed to the sun. This pictures the hearer who receives with joy the message of the gospel, but when persecution and trials come because of following Christ he gives up and deserts the cause (v. 15). (c) Thorny ground (v. 7). This ground is good, but it has thorns growing in it. The seeds spring up, but the plant has no room to develop. This pictures the Christians who bear no Christian fruit because of being preoccupied with "cares, riches and pleasures" of this life (v. 14). (d) Good ground (v. 8). The seed here sprang up and bore fruit to the full measure. This pictures the honest heart which receives the gospel message and allows it to produce in its life a full harvest of grain (v. 15).

The application of this parable is found in verses 16-18.

2. Kinship with Jesus Christ (vv. 19-21). Jesus teaches here that there is a relationship to Him which is closer than the tie of blood.

III. The Great Missionary Doing Wonders (vv. 22-39).

1. Calming the Storm (vv. 22-25). (1) Jesus asleep (v. 23). While the disciples were sailing the ship the Master fell asleep. (2) The frightened disciples (vv. 23, 24). As their ships were filled with water the disciples awoke Jesus with their cry of peril. (3) Jesus rebuked the wind and water (v. 24). At His word there was a great calm. (4) Jesus rebuked the disciples (v. 25). He did not rebuke them for waking Him, but for their lack of faith.

2. Casting Out Demons (vv. 26-39). Demon-possession was in that day, and is today, an awful reality. (1) Jesus met by the demoniac (vv. 26-29). (2) Jesus' question (v. 30). The purpose of this question doubtless was to bring the real man to consciousness—to enable him to distinguish between the demon and himself. (3) The demons' request (vv. 31, 32). They asked permission to enter into a herd of swine. It seems that the demons have a dislike for disembodiment. The devil cannot act without Divine permission. (4) The request granted (vv. 32, 33). Just why this was done we do not know. Since Jesus did it we must believe that it was wise. (5) The effect upon the people (vv. 34-37). (a) The keepers of the swine went and made it known in the city and country. (b) The people made investigation. They saw the man clothed and in his right mind and heard the testimony of those who had seen what was done. [illegible] besought Jesus to depart from them. [illegible] Request of the man whom He healed (vv. 38, 39). He desired to be with Jesus. This was natural and right but his responsibility was to go home and show them what great things God had done for him.

Gift Indeed!

The churchwarden of a country church was to be married to a nurse from a local hospital.

A fortnight previously it was decided by the members of the congregation to give him some token of esteem. A committee sat and at last decided on a sum of money in a net purse worked by the curate's wife.

The decision was announced at a church meeting by the curate, a nervous little man.

"My dear friends," he said, "it has—er—been decided—er—to present to our esteemed friend, Mr. L——, on the —er—occasion of—er—his marriage, £25—and a pet nurse!"

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Never Suspect It

Applicants for Insurance Often Rejected.

Judging from reports from druggists who are constantly in direct touch with the public, there is one preparation that has been very successful in overcoming these conditions. The mild and healing influence of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its remarkable record of success.

An examining physician for one of the prominent Life Insurance Companies, in an interview on the subject, made the astonishing statement that one reason why so many applicants for insurance are rejected is because kidney trouble is so common to the American people, and the large majority of those whose applications are declined do not even suspect that they have the disease. Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is on sale at all drug stores in bottles of two sizes, medium and large.

However, if you wish first to test this great preparation send ten cents to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a sample bottle. When writing be sure and mention this paper.—Advertisement.

One Exception.

"This year," observed Professor Jones, the instructor in chemistry, "I have a stupid lot of students. Here's one paper which shows plainly that the lad who wrote it doesn't understand that expansion and contraction are contradictory terms."

"They aren't always," said Professor Smith, the instructor in economics. "Now in my classes I find it necessary to state explicitly the fact that the constant contraction of debts is sure to result in their expansion."

FREEDOM FROM LAXATIVES

Discovery by Scientists Has Replaced Them.

Pills and salts give temporary relief from constipation only at the expense of permanent injury, says an eminent medical authority.

Science has found a newer, better way—a means as simple as Nature itself.

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft and moving. But when constipation exists this natural lubricant is not sufficient. Medical authorities have found that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative it cannot gripe. It is in no sense a medicine. And like pure water it is harmless and pleasant.

Nujol is prescribed by physicians; used in leading hospitals. Get a bottle from your druggist today.—Advertisement.

Ohio Wool Producers' Warehouse.

Ohio wool producers, who are members of the Ohio Sheep and Wool Growers' association, use this warehouse, located at Columbus, O., as the collection point for their wool. Shipments made here are weighed, graded and prepared for co-operative sale.

Successful Agency.

The Ohio wool sales agency has been one of the most successful in the country and, it is expected, will handle practically as much wool as all of the other state-wide co-operative agencies in the country. More than two and a half million pounds of wool have been received at the warehouse this year.

Not only has a central co-operative sales agency aided materially in getting good returns for Ohio wool producers, but the warehouse itself has made a good return on money invested.

During the busy season it is not uncommon to have eight or ten carloads of wool brought up to the warehouse in one day. A special track connects with railroads coming into Columbus. Ample office space for the transaction of necessary business and the keeping of records is available.

PLANS OF FRUIT AND VEGETABLE GROWERS

Details of Organization Completed and By-Laws Adopted at Recent Chicago Meeting.

The board of directors of the Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers, Inc., at the close of its session in Chicago announced through the American Farm Bureau federation that the details of organization have been completed and by-laws adopted.

An executive office in New York city and an organization office in Chicago have been established. New York was chosen for the executive office, or actual sales agency for the following reasons: It is the largest exporting center in the United States; it has the largest fruit and vegetable consuming public; it is the most important fruit and vegetable marketing center in the United States; through the influence of A. R. Rule, general manager of the Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers, banking interests in New York have declared themselves in sympathy with the new co-operative plan and will support it.

The organization office in Chicago will conduct the organization work and will have the direct contact with the field. Field service men will operate from this office.

From the indicated tonnage of fruit and vegetables in view that will come into the organization, together with the tonnage already in the hands of the North American Fruit exchange, which will be handled by the federation, indications are that this new federation of fruit and vegetable growers' associations will start January 1 as the largest distributor of fruit and vegetables in the United States.

The Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers, Inc., was organized on the recommendation of the fruit marketing committee of 21, appointed by James R. Howard, president of the American Farm Bureau federation on August 25, 1921. The committee of 21 was appointed as a result of the national fruit marketing conference, the third of the commodity conferences called by the American Farm Bureau federation.

A contract was signed with the North American Fruit exchange which has been operating since 1911 as a nation-wide non-speculative sales agency for fruit and vegetables, whereby the force and effectiveness of the two organizations were brought together under the name of the Federated Fruit Growers, Inc. During the meeting of the board last week in Chicago, at the suggestion of vegetable growers from many states who were present, it was decided to alter the name to include the vegetable growers.

"The combining of the ideals of the Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers, Inc., with the already existing organization machinery of the North American Fruit exchange," says C. H. Durst, secretary treasurer of the Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers, "will eliminate the need for building a sales organization. By including the vegetable growers we will still further reduce the overhead and the services of the best salesmen in the business will be made available. The North American Fruit exchange has 140 distributing points and many salaried representatives. These facilities will be at the disposal of the new member associations who come into the Federated Fruit and Vegetable Growers."

Actual operations will begin January 1, Mr. Durst said.

ABSOLUTE REST FOR WOMEN

Recreation Camp Established on Site of Stonewall Jackson's Home in West Virginia.

(By Izetta Jewell Brown, Member of the Home and Community Committee.)

A recreation camp for farm women, the first of its kind in the United States, is one of the accomplisments of the West Virginia Farm Bureau Federation.

Through appropriation from the state legislature and from gifts, the site of Stonewall Jackson's old home at Jackson's Mill, W. Va., was purchased and converted into a camp for farm women. It was called Jackson's Mills camp. Bathhouses, dining rooms and assembly rooms have been built and the ground surrounding the old Jackson mill, which is still standing, has been turned into a real camp.

About 100 farm women attended the first camp which started August 1. How everybody did enjoy that week!

Izetta Jewell Brown.

Next year the camp will not accommodate the number of farm women who have already indicated their desire to be there.

The week's program included class study, nature study, hikes, general assemblies, swimming, vespers, sings, and lots and lots of rest. Special stunts were given on stunt night. No work was done and $5 a week was charged for board. Everything was arranged to give farm women present one good week of absolute rest mingled with recreation and fun.

Isn't that worth while?

Organize Potato Growers.

The Texas farm bureau is organizing the sweet potato growers of the state into the Farm Bureau Sweet Potato Growers' association. Sweet potato growers in Arkansas have already organized and have had a successful year's experience. Growers in Louisiana and Oklahoma have also begun movements to organize.

RADIO

HOW AN INDOOR LOOP ANTENNA IS BUILT

Has Advantages in Size and Directional Properties but Picks Up Little Energy.

If you live in a section of the country infested with radio fans who send "CQ" or send some station call by the hour while you are trying to catch the music from a broadcasting station, a loop antenna may help solve your difficulty. Or if you live in an apartment or a very congested section of the city where there is no room to erect an antenna, or where the landlord objects, a loop antenna can be used in lieu of an outdoor one. Let it be thoroughly understood, however, that the energy picked up by a loop antenna only approaches that of an outdoor antenna when the physical dimensions of the loop antenna approach those of the outdoor antenna. Don't wind a hundred feet of wire on a "Mother's Oats" box and expect a loop antenna so constructed to give the same signal strength as the same hundred feet of wire stretched outside as a single-wire outdoor antenna.

The two advantages of a loop antenna, then, are its small physical dimensions and its directional properties. The most serious disadvantage of the loop antenna is the small amount of energy picked up. If loop antenna is used for the reception of close, high-powered stations, ordinary regenerative receivers with audio-frequency amplifiers will give good results. However, if a long-distance reception of medium and low power transmitting stations is desired, then radio-frequency amplification must be used.

There has been placed on the market a radio-frequency amplifying transformer, type UC-1714, to be used in conjunction with Radiotrons type UC-201. Such a combination is claimed to give an audibility amplification of 20 per stage. A loop antenna with a two or three stage audio-frequency amplifier, employing type UC-714 coupling transformers in conjunction with one's present set, will give practically the same signal strength that is now being received from the outdoor antenna.

Though a loop antenna of larger section and fewer turns would be more directional, the antenna described here will give good results for its size, and is small enough to be easily transported. The material required for the two-loop antenna is as follows:

Two strips of wood, 5½ feet long by 2 inches wide by 1 inch thick. Straight, close-grained wood should be used in order to guard against warping.

One hundred feet of No. 14 bare antenna wire, preferably stranded phosphor bronze.

Four pieces of bakelite, 2 inches square by 3-16 inch thick.

Four small brass angles of the type that can be purchased in the 5 and 10 cent stores.

One dozen 1½ inch long 6-32 brass machine screws with nuts.

Notch the two pieces of wood in the center and at the ends, as shown in Figure III. Then with a No. 25 drill bore three holes in each piece of wood, as shown. The notches in the center part of the two pieces of wood should allow the two pieces to be fitted together to form a perfect right angle. The notches should be just wide enough so that one of the four 2-inch square pieces of bakelite will just fit. After the notches have been checked to see that they are of the proper size, fit the two strips of wood together, putting a little furniture glue in the joint and bolting it fast with a long bolt. The brass angles should now be fitted in the corners of the joint to make the two strips of wood form a right angle. To prevent warping and for the sake of appearance, the woodwork should be given several coats of shellac.

The natural period of this loop antenna is approximately 175 meters. To tune to wave lengths in excess of 175 meters, a 0.0005 microfarad condenser is shunted across the leads of the loop. The closed oscillating circuit formed by the loop and the shunt condenser can be connected by any detecting circuit as shown in Fig. I or can be used with radio-frequency amplifiers. When used with receiving sets employing a variocouple and two variometers, the loop is connected, and the shunt condenser is omitted. The tuning is accomplished by means of the grid variometer.

A loop antenna will pick up a maximum amount of energy when the transmitting station is in the plane of the loop, and a minimum amount of energy when the transmitting station is in a direction at right angles to the plane of the loop. In Fig. II, the loop will pick up a maximum amount of energy from Station A and a minimum amount from Station B.

Care must be taken in setting up a loop to see that it will not be shielded. The energy picked up by a loop antenna is small at best, especially if the loop is not oriented to its maximum position, and any reduction in received energy will decrease the signals below audibility. For example, don't set up a loop antenna inside a steel framed building or up in the attic directly under a well grounded metal roof.

Capacity effect due to the body of the operator is quite noticeable with a loop antenna. The operator must not get close to the loop or the capacity effect of his body will detune the oscillating circuit. While the loop is rather difficult to handle in some instances and can only be used to replace an outdoor antenna at a loss in received energy, its directional properties are very advantageous in the reduction of interference.

TIPS TO THE RADIOIST

The danger of stringing radio wires over light or power wires was demonstrated in New Jersey recently when a well-known citizen was shocked to death.

Radio distance lends enchantment. A writer says, "A great many amateurs prefer to hear a few discordant notes from 1,000 miles away than a wonderfully executed program from their own town."

One of the latest inventions in the radio field is a filter that separates the telephone and telegraph waves. We shall look forward to the day when a filter will separate the good music from the bad and automatically send the latter to Uranus.

Dean Dexter S. Kimball of Cornell university in a recent radio talk to engineers made two important points: One, that a man can now say "I'll tell the world" without using slang; and the other, that the study of ether vibrations, upon which radio is based, is in its infancy, and the future promises even more than the development from manual signs to radio.

GOOD HIGHWAYS

VARIOUS TYPES OF HIGHWAYS

Series of Motion Picture Films Illustrate Practice in Construction of Roads.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A series of one-reel motion-picture films illustrating modern practice in the construction of the various types of highways has been prepared under the direction of the bureau of public roads and are now available for free distribution by the motion picture section of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The films, consisting of one reel each, are as follows: "Modern Concrete Road Construction"; "Building Bituminous Roads"; "Mixed Asphalt Pavements"; "Brick From Clay to Pavement"; "Granite Block Paving"; "High Roads and Sky Roads."

In addition there will be completed in a short time "Building Forest Roads" and "Around the West by Forest Roads." A film on gravel-road construction is in course of preparation.

An Improved Forest Road in Colorado.

These films are intended for use in engineering colleges, road meetings, and other public gatherings. They may be obtained upon application to the department for use on specific dates without cost other than that of paying for transportation both ways. On account of the limited number of copies of each film it is best to make reservations some time in advance.

NOVEL ROAD BUILDING PLAN

Stretch of Quarter of Mile Long Built to Endure Is to Be Destroyed Rapidly.

A road about a quarter of a mile long, built as enduringly as possible, to be destroyed as quickly as possible, is the odd but practical basis of an experiment now being conducted at Pittsburg, Cal., says the Christian Science Monitor. The road is laid down in the shape of a race track and is constructed of 13 sections, each one of a different type of concrete pavement. The problem is to find out which will last longest. A procession of some 40 motor trucks, loaned by the United States government, travels continuously over its surface. There are tunnels underneath and ditches along the sides from which observations of the effect of traffic on the different sections are being made. Sections that wear out first are to be restored and kept in repair until the stoutest section, whichever it may prove to be, has been destroyed. The cost of building and wearing out the road, which is being defrayed in part by contributions of men, machinery and material by the road building interests, probably will run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is hoped, however, that the practical information thus obtained will more than offset its cost.

TRANSPORT PRIMER PRAISED

Book Prepared by Educational Committee to Be Translated for Use of High Schools.

Prompted by the success of the educational outline on highway transport prepared for university use under their direction by Prof. Lewis McIntyre, the officials of the highway and highway transport education committee have now turned to Professor Buckner of the school of education of the University of Pittsburgh to translate the book into language designed for use by high school students throughout the country.

The new pamphlet will be prepared in co-operation with officials of the United States bureau of public roads, the United States bureau of education and other organizations represented on the committee, and will be the first comprehensive effort to place the subject of highway transport before the high school students of the country.

Mrs. Linton Tells How Helpful Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is at This Period

Denver, Colorado.—"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for seven years and I cannot tell you the good it has done me. It is good for young and old and I always keep a bottle of it in the house, for I am at that time of life when it calls for Lydia E. Pinkham's help. My husband saw your ad. in the papers and said 'You have taken everything you can think of, now I want you to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound!' So I let him get it, and I soon felt better and he told me 'I want you to take about six bottles.' So I did and I keep house and do all my own work and work out by the day and feel fine now. I tell every one about the Vegetable Compound, for so many of my friends thought I would not get well."—Mrs. R. J. LINTON, 1850 West 33d Avenue, Denver, Colorado.

After reading letters like the above, and we are constantly publishing them, why should any woman hesitate to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound if she is in need of help? It brings relief where other medicines fail.

Fires Spotted by Forest Air Patrol.

The value of airplane forest patrol was forcibly demonstrated recently near Roseburg, Ore. One of the state foresters in that city had received reports from the lookouts in his territory that there were no fires to be seen. It happened that just at that particular time he decided to accompany one of the army air service pilots engaged in patrolling the Oregon forests. He had not proceeded very far on his aerial journey before he realized that the reports he had received from his lookouts were not as reliable as he was led to believe. To his great consternation he discovered that he had no less than 12 real fires on his hands which no one knew anything about. Needless to say, the state forester is now converted to aerial forestry patrol for life.

Hear Laird, Friday Eve

The outlook for the lecture to be given at the Christian Church, Friday eve, of this week is encouraging to the Juniors of the High School who are sponsoring it. The lecturer, George R. Laird, has been before the public for several years under the management of the Redpath Chautauqua. He is an orator of recognized ability, and his philosophy is mingled with wit and humor of high quality. He is heard every where with keen interest and is recalled for successive engagements.

On Saturday night of this week he will lecture for the second time before the Toledo Chamber of Commerce. His lecture to be given in St. Joe Friday eve is entitled "The Key To The Golden Age."

The price of admission will be 35c for adults; 20c for children; children under school age free. Come early and get a good seat.

No Getting Around It

A few weeks ago everyone felt so encouraged about our new roads when so much gravel was being hauled on them. The township, county and state have gone to a great expense for gravel and hauling, a fact that every taxpayer and citizen is concerned about.

But that is the extent of it in some cases. Without further attention these highways are going to be right back in the same old condition in a short time. The loose gravel is being worked to the ditch and deep ruts and holes are being cut in the track by the heavy traffic.

What they need, it seems, is an occasional scraping to put the gravel back in the center and in time it would become packed in the right places.

We are thinking particularly of the stretch of road east of town to Bear Creek.

"The Vision"

Successful Entertainment Given Sunday Evening at the M. P. Church

"The Vision," a missionary pageant, as given at the M. P. Church Sunday night, was witnessed by a capacity audience.

The author's conception was a a picture drama of the lives and conditions of people everywhere, in mission lands, in mountains, in prisons, on the seas, whose lot in life without Christianity constituted an appeal and a challenge to the church.

The stage was set and the lighting so arranged as to display effectively the various human types as they appeared one by one dressed in native costume and stood in relief, while readers concealed behind the screen read alternately character sketches and appropriate passages from the Bible. The underlying motive of the drama was the conversion of the familiar objector to missions,—that type of church member who, because of limited knowledge, has failed to interpret Christ's commission to "go into all the world and preach the gospel." This character was represented as having fallen asleep, and the revue portrayed his dream. The dream made him a convert to missions.

The program was given by the missionary committee of the Sunday School and the offering was devoted to missionary purposes. The committee comprised Mrs. Byron Widney, Mrs. C. H. Havens and Mrs. C. S. Johnson. Several vocal numbers were rendered. Those participating in the program were: Robert Johnson, George Berry, Neva Hursh, Martha Quance, Marie Kinsey, Martha Miser, Hilda Koch, Albert Wade, Ida Kinsey, Howard Shilling, William Quance, Orla Woodcox, Clayton Wyatt, Ruth Havens, DuWayne Kinsey, Melba Andress, little Miss Marea Wade, Velma and Inez Kinsey, Virginia Ginther, Mrs. Ed [illegible] and Mrs. Fred Jenkins. Mrs. F B. Leighty presided at the piano [illegible] Mrs. Rev Koch, Mrs E. M. Widney and Rev Havens assisted with the vocal music. The orchestra rendered several numbers.

Wednesday of last week the Ladies Culture Club were very pleasantly entertained at the home of Mr. J. R. Culbertson at Hicksville. The hostess served a delicious dinner at the noon hour. At roll call seventeen members responded. Mrs. Flossie Widney who has been out of the activites of the club for some time, was reinstated. Also Mrs. Earl B. Smith was taken in as a new member. The day was very enjoyably spent and those present gave their members a vote of thanks for the splendid entertainment given.

The active members of the Ladies Literary club of this place, were entertained Wednesday of last week, at the home of Mrs. C. A. Patterson, on South Harrison street, Fort Wayne. The honorary members of the club acted as hostesses. The decorations thru out the living rooms were the club colors, red and green. An elaborate luncheon of pretty appointments was served at the noon hour and in the afternoon an interesting literary program was held. At the close letters from absent honorary members were read. A picture gallery of the club members since its beginning was enjoyed by all. A picture was then taken of those present. After singing "God be with you till we meet again" the ladies gave the hostesses a vote of thanks for their royal entertainment.

Hicksville Garage Burned

The Royal Garage, formerly the Kimble and Warner Garage in Hicksville, was considerably damaged by flames last Wednesday morning at about 3:30 o'clock. The loss was confined to the roof and some of the contents as the remaining part of the construction was of fireproof material.

The cause of the fire is unknown, but it is assumed and is accepted that it either started from defects in the electric wiring of the building or from a short circuit in the wiring of one of the automobiles in storage.

The Hicksville fire department is accredited for the halt put to the blaze for it made a splendid fight and its members responded so readily to the call.

This building practically new and one of the largest in that section of the country.

Hunting Party Returned

Eight Fine Deer Unloaded at St. Joe

The Widney hunting party returned from its four weeks' trip to the "big woods" in Maine last Friday, reporting a very successful trip indeed. Mr. Widney, who has been in the party every fall for a number of years past, stated that the personality of the party this year was the best that it has ever been and that weather conditions for hunting were the very best.

Besides having all the venison they could eat while in camp they brought out with them 38 fine deer. Eight of these came to St. Joe and were unloaded from a B. & O train Monday morning. M. A Hull had the two largest bucks of the bunch.

Hymn

For Summer's bloom and Autumn's blight,
For bending wheat and blasted maize,
For health and sickness, Lord of light,
And Lord of darkness, hear our praise!

We trace to Thee our joys and woes—
To Thee, of causes still the cause—
We thank Thee that Thy hand bestows;
We bless Thee that Thy love withdraws.

We bring no sorrows to Thy throne;
We come to Thee with no complaint;
In Providence Thy will is done,
And that is sacred to the saint.

Here, on this blest Thanksgiving Night,
We raise to Thee our grateful voice;
For what Thou doest, Lord, is right;
And, thus believing, we rejoice.
—From "Bitter-Sweet," by J. G. Holland.

The Spirit of Thanksgiving

As we read of old time Thanksgiving customs, we realize that the world has been traveling fast since then—away from the simple and the spiritual.

One of the customs, particularly, was quaint.

After the Thanksgiving dinner, while the family was still seated around the table, each member was asked to tell for what, in the past year, he was particularly thankful.

These recitals were always revelations of character. The small children of the family mentioned some material thing, a sled or a doll, for which they were grateful.

The older children, those in their teens, were more abstract. They were thankful for the advantages of education, of family prestige, or their social position—a bit self-centered, perhaps, as is wont with youth in its teens.

But mother and father, in their maturity of years, knew that the greatest blessings of life were health and happiness, and their recitals of thankfulness always included a word of thanksgiving that the family had been spared illness and poverty. No thought for themselves, but thankful of son's success in school, and daughter's improvement in controlling her temper.

The spirit of the day calls for just such a touch of spiritual introspection. It keeps alive that family spirit, the joy of an assembled family, the particular source of Thanksgiving to each member, along with the joy of the old-fashioned dinner.

Old-Time Thanksgiving.

A quaint account of a Thanksgiving dinner back in 1779, is given in a letter of one Julianna Smith, written to her dear "Dear Cousin Betsey," found in an old diary:

"This year it was Uncle Simeon's turn to have the dinner at his house, but of course we all helped them as they help us when it is our turn, and there is always enough for us all to do. All the baking of pies and cakes was done at our house, and we had the big oven heated and filled twice each day for three days before it was all done, and everything was good, though we did have to do without some things that ought to be used. Neither Love nor Money could buy Raisins, but our good red cherries dried without the pitse, did almost as well, and happily Uncle Simeon still had some spices in store. The tables were set in the Dining Hall, and even that big room had no space to spare when we were all seated. The Servants had enough ado to get around the Tables and serve us all without oversetting things. There were our two Grandmothers, side by side. They are always handsome old ladies, but now, many thought, they were handsomer than ever, and happy they were to look upon so many of their descendants.

The Crown of the Feast.

"Ther was no Plum Pudding, but a boiled Suet Pudding, stirred thick with dried Plums and Cherries, was called by the old Name and answered the purpose. All the other spice had been used in the Mince Pie, so for this Pudding we used a jar of West India preserved Ginger, which chanced to be left of the last shipment which Uncle Simeon had from there. We chopped the Ginger small and stirred it through with the Plums and Cherries. It was extraordinary good. The day was bitter cold and when we got home from meeting, which father did not keep over long by reason of the cold, we were glad of the fire in Uncle's Dining Hall, but by the time the dinner was half over, those of us who were on the fire side of one table was forced to [illegible] our chairs [illegible] the side of the other table [illegible] had sat there [illegible] around to the fire [illegible]. THE BLESSED
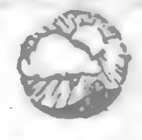
By Nancy Byrd Turner



November darkens to its close,
They kneel beside their flickering hearth;
Without, one little wistful rose
Is drooping toward the barren earth.
A frost had bitten the April fruit,
A blight had seared the summer corn,
Sharp hail had smitten to the root
The golden barley, overborne.

"But oh," he cries, "I love you, sweet!
What shall we reck of wind or weather
So long as we can surely meet
The sunshine and the storm together?"

Her meager little garden prayed
All long July for quenching rain;
The sad-eyed cattle left the shade
To seek their cooling creek in vain;
The flowers that her hands had cherished,
That made the borders beauty-bright,
They bowed their lovely heads and perished;
Her tears had fallen at the sight.

"But ah," she breathes, "I love you, dear!
It cannot truly matter whether
We gain the year or lose the year,
Just so we live the year together."

Then on the hearth a fagot falls
And breaks to sudden leaping light;
A cricket in a corner calls;
Slow silence deepens down the night.
The circle of his young arm makes
A shelter where the dark had been;
The old clock on the mantel wakes
And cries Thanksgiving in.

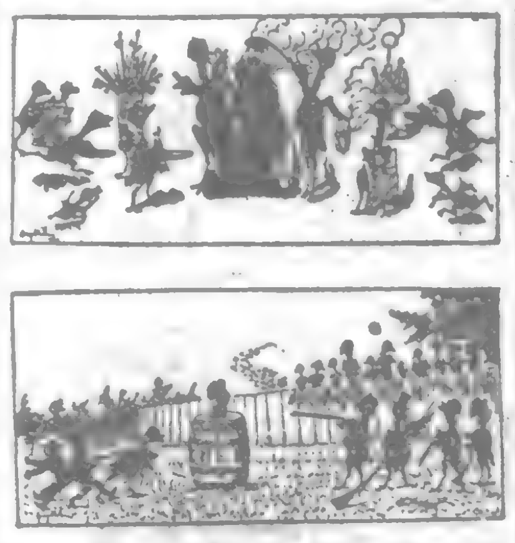
Awful Possibility



If Thanksgiving Dinner Was Reversed, How Would You Like It?

REASONS FOR GIVING THANKS

As a Nation, the American People Has Ample Cause for Rejoicing at This Period.

It is three hundred years since Thanksgiving day was first celebrated on the American continent. The Pilgrim band, though they had lost half their numbers during the first winter at Plymouth, and though they were beset by hardships and by the fear of their savage neighbors, found in the survival of the little colony and in the hope of a gradually ameliorating lot just cause for thanksgiving to God. Have we, who have inherited the institutions and the spiritual ideals that they labored to establish, less reason than they to be thankful?

Like the other nations of the world the United States has reached a great social and political crisis. We have passed through a great war, and we begin to feel the burden of debt and disaster that the war laid upon mankind. Our trade is disarranged; neither financially nor economically are we so prosperous as we are wont to be. We are a little afraid of the future, for we have been shaken out of the easy and comfortable confidence in our own efficiency in which we have been used to live.

But great material prosperity is not always a matter for thanksgiving. It sometimes softens and dissipates the strength and virtue of a nation. Perhaps nations like men should echo the prayer of Agur: "Give me neither poverty nor riches." We have enough and, like the Pilgrims, we can reasonably hope for an increasing store of comforts in the coming years. Is there not ample cause for thanksgiving in the fact that, although the nation has been tried by adversity and loss and assailed by doubt and misgivings, it shows no sign of losing its heart or its head? The gospel of hard work and cheerful courage still counts most Americans as its adherents. We are working our way out of the depression that the war caused.

We do not thank God because our way is the way of fatness and of peace, but because, in the time of testing and trial, our people are able to quit themselves like men.—Youth's Companion.

The Society Editor
By
WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

THEY say that in the newspaper offices of the city men work in ruts; that the editorial writer never reports an item, no matter how much he knows of it; that a repoter is not allowed to express an editorial view of a subject, even though he be well qualified to speak; but on our little country daily newspaper it is entirely different. We work on the interchangeable point system. Everyone writes items, all of us get advertising and job-work when it comes our way, and when one of us writes anything particularly good, it is marked for the editorial page. The religious reporter does the racing matinee in Wildwood park, and the financial editor, who gets the market reports from the feed-store men, also gets any church news that comes along.

The only time we ever established a department was when we made Miss Larrabee society editor. She came from the high school, where her graduating essay on Kipling attracted our attention, and, after an office council had decided that a Saturday society page would be a paying proposition.

At first, for six months after she came to the office, Miss Larrabee devoted herself to the accumulation of professional pride. This pride was as much a part of her life as her pompadour, which at that time was so high that she had to tiptoe to reach it. However she managed to keep it up was the wonder of the office. Finally, we all agreed that she must use chicken-fence. She denied this, but was inclined to be good-natured about it, and, as an office joke, the boys used to leave a step-ladder by her desk so that she could climb up and see how her top-knot really looked. Nothing ruffled her spirits, and we soon quit teasing her and began to admire her work. In addition to filling six columns of the Saturday's paper with her society report in a town where a church social is important enough to justify publishing the names of those who wait on the tables, Miss Larrabee was a credit to the office.

She was always invited to the entertainments at the homes of the Worthingtons and the Conklins, who had stationary washtubs in the basements of their houses and who ate dinner instead of supper in the evening; and when she put on what the boys called her trotting harness, her silk petticoats rustled louder than any others at the party. One day she suddenly dropped her pompadour and appeared with her hair parted in the middle and doused over her ears in long, undulating billows. No other girl in town came within a quarter of an inch of Miss Larrabee's dare. When straight fronts became stylish, Miss Larrabee was a vertical marvel, and when she rolled up her sleeves and organized a country club, she referred to her shoes as boots and took the longest steps in town. But with it all she was no mere clothes-horse. We drilled it into her head during her first two weeks that "society" news in a country town means not merely the doings of the cut-glass set, but that it means as well the doings of the Happy Hoppers, the Trundle-Bed Trash, the Knights of Columbus, the Rathbone Sisters, the King's Daughters, the Epworth league, the Christian Endeavorers, the Woman's Relief corps, the Ladies' Aid and the Home Missionary societies, Miss Nelson's Dancing class, the Switchmen's Annual ball—if we get their job-work—and every kindred, every tribe, except such as gather in what is known as "kitchen sweats" and occasionally send in call for the police. When Miss Larrabee got this into her head she began to groan under her burden, and by the end of the year, though she had great pride in her profession, she affected to loathe her department.

Weddings were her especial abominations. When the first social cloud appeared on the horizon indicating the approach of a series of showers for the bride which would culminate in a cloudburst at some stone church, Miss Larrabee would begin to rumble like distant thunder and, as the storm grew thicker, she would flash out crooked chain-lightning imprecation on the heads of the young people, their fathers and mothers and uncles and aunts. By the day of the wedding she would be rolling a steady [illegible] of polite, decolorized, expurgated, ladylike profanity.

While she sat at her desk writing the [illegible] account of the event, it was [illegible] a live wire to [illegible] [illegible] sive ring ceremony." When she wrote:

"The distinguished company came forward to offer congratulations to the newly-wedded pair," she would say as she sharpened her pencil-point: "There's nothing like a wedding to reveal what a raft of common kin people have," and we knew that it was all over and that she was closing the article with: "A dazzling array of costly and beautiful presents was exhibited in the library," for then she would pick up her copy, dog-ear the sheets, and jab them on the hook as she sighed: "Another great American pickle-dish exhibit ended."

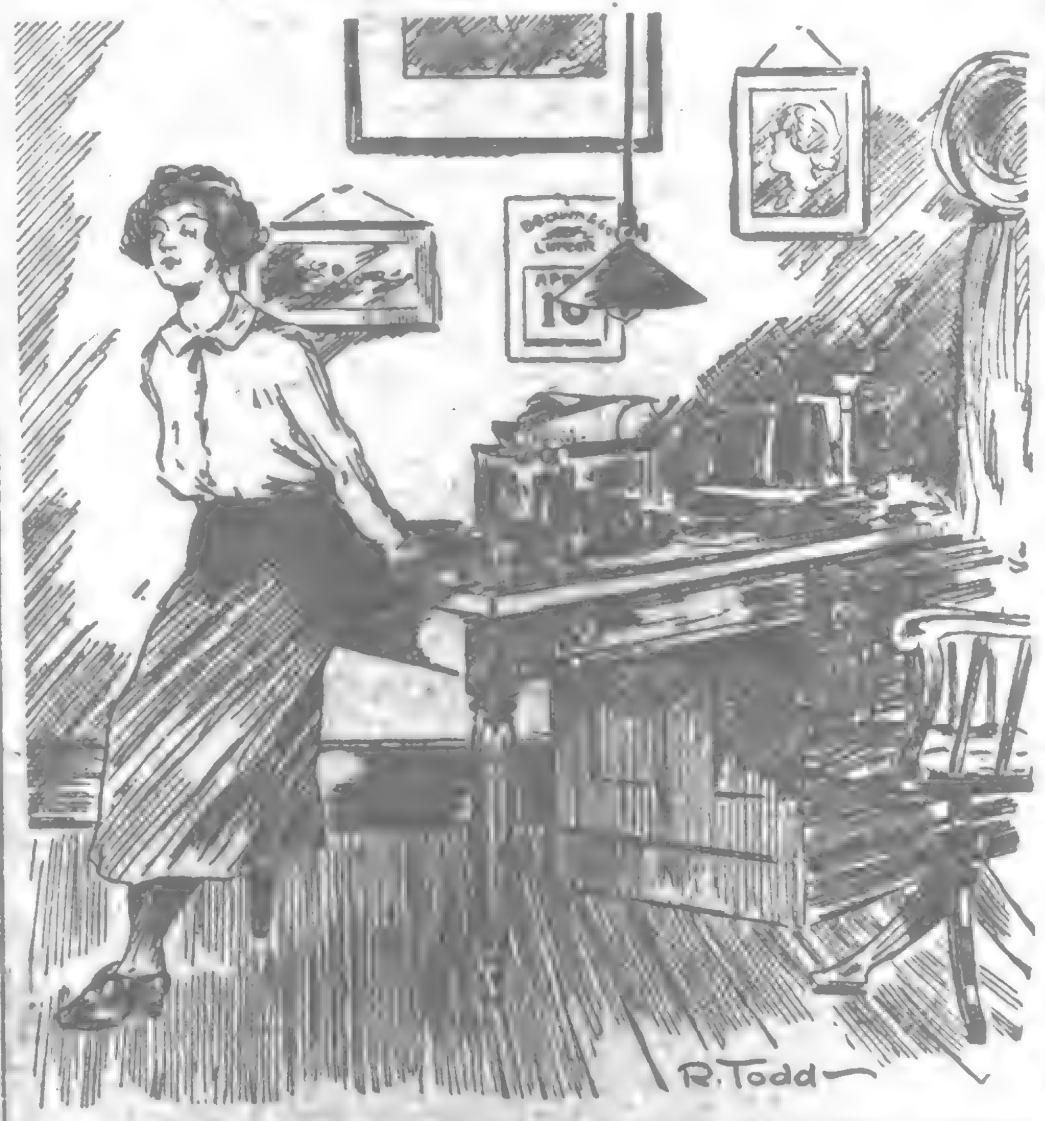
In the way she did two things Miss Larrabee excited the wonder and admiration of the office. One was the way that she kept tab on brides. We heard through her of the brides who could cook, and of those who were beginning life by accumulating a bright little pile of tin cans in the alley. She knew the brides who could do their own sewing and those who could not. She had the single girl's sniff at the bride who wore her trousseau season after season, made over and fixed up, and she gave the office the benefit of her opinion of the husband in the case who had a new tailor-made suit every fall and spring. She scented young married troubles from afar, and we knew in the office whether his folks were edging upon her, or her people were edging upon him. If a young married man danced more than twice in one evening with anyone but his wife, Miss Larrabee made faces at his back when he passed the office window, and if she caught a young married woman flirting, Miss Larrabee regaled us by telling with whom the woman in question had opened a "fresh bottle of emotions."

The other way in which Miss Larrabee displayed genius for her work was in describing women's costumes. Three of four times a year, when there are large social gatherings, we print descriptions of the woman's gowns. Only three women in our town, Mrs. Worthington, Mrs. Conklin, and the second Mrs. Markley, have more than one new party dress in a twelve-month, and most of the women make a party gown last two or three years. Miss Larrabee was familiar with every dress in town. She knew it made over, and no woman was cunning enough to conceal the truth even with a spangled yoke, a chiffon bertha, or a net overdress; yet Miss Larrabee would describe the gown, not merely twice, but half a dozen times, so that the woman wearing it might send the description to her relatives back East without arousing their suspicion that she was wearing the same dress year after year. Therefore, whenever Miss Larrabee wrote up the dresses worn at a party, we were sure to sell from fifty to a hundred extra papers. She could so turn a breastpin and a home-made point-lace handkerchief tucked in the front of a good old lady's best black satin into "point-lace and diamonds," that they were always good for a dozen [illegible] of the paper, and she never overlooked the dress of the wife of a good advertiser, no matter how plain it might be.

She was worth her wages to the office merely as a compendium of shams. She knew whether the bridal couple, who announced that they would spend their honeymoon in the East, were really going to Niagara Falls or whether they were going to spend a week with his people [illegible]. She knew [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] office since Miss Larrabee left, but they do not seem to get the work done with any system. She was not only industrious but practical. Friday mornings, when her work piled up, instead of fussing around the office and chattering at the telephone, she would dive into her desk and bring up her regular list of adjectives. These she would copy on three slips, carefully dividing the list so that no one had a duplicate, and in the afternoon each of the boys received a slip with a list of parties, and with instructions to scatter the adjectives she had given him through the accounts of the parties assigned to him—and the work was soon done. There was no scratching the head for synonyms for "beautiful," "superb" or "elegant." Miss Larrabee had doled out to each of us the adjectives necessary, and, given the adjectives, society reporting is easy. The editing of the copy is easy also, for one does not have to remember whether or not the refreshments were "delicious" at the Jones party when he sees the word in connection with the viands at the Smith party. No two parties were ever "elegant" the same week. No two events were "charming." No two women were "exquisitely" gowned. The person who was assigned the adjective "delightful" by Miss Larrabee might stick it in front of a luncheon, pin it on a hostess, or use it for an evening's entertainment. But he could use it only once. And with a list of those present and the adjectives thereunto appertaining, even a boy could get up a column in half an hour. She had an artist's pride in the finished work, however much she might dislike the thing in making, and she used to sail down to the press-room as soon as the paper was out, and, picking up the paper from the folder, she would stand reading her page, line upon line, precept upon precept, though every word and syllable was familiar to her.

During her first year she joined the Woman's State Press club, but she discovered that she was the only real worker in the club and never attended a second meeting. She told us that too many of the women wore white stockings and low shoes, read their own unpublished short stories, and regarded her wide-shouldered shirtwaist and melodramatic openwork hosiery with suspicion and alarm.



"Miss Larrabee Made Faces at His Back When He Passed the Office Window"

As the years passed, and wedding after wedding sizzled under her pen, she complained to us that she was beginning to be called "auntie" in too many houses, and that the stock of available young men who didn't wear their handkerchiefs under their collars at the dances had dwindled down to three. This reality faces every girl who lives in a country town. Then she is left with two alternatives: to go visiting or to begin bringing them up by hand.

Miss Larrabee went visiting. At the end of a month she wrote: "It's all over with me. He is a nice fellow, and has a job doing 'Live Topics About Town' here on the Sun. Give my job to the little Wheatly girl, and tell her to quit writing poetry, and hike up her dress in the back. My adjectives are in the left-hand corner of the desk under 'When Knighthood Was in Flower.' And do you suppose you could get me and the grand keeper of the records and seals a pass home for Christmas if I'd do you a New York letter some time?

A TRUE RAT STORY

Auburntown, Tenn., 6-22-22.
Stearns Electric Paste Co.,

Dear Sirs: Mr. Robert T. Donnell of Auburntown, Tenn., came in our store the other day and wanted something to kill rats, so I sold him a box Stearns Rat Paste. And he put some paste on six biscuits that night and the next morning he found fifty-four big rats. And the second night he put out four more biscuits with paste on them, and the second morning he found seventeen more rats, making a total of seventy-one rats in two nights, and there were lots more that he did not find.

This is some big rat tale, but, nevertheless, it is so. Just thought would write to let you know that your rat paste is good.

Respectfully, KENNEDY BROTHERS.

American Farm Bureau

Elaine Hendricks and Bertha Boger.

These two Colorado club girls, Elaine Hendricks and Bertha Boger, won the state championship in canning at the Colorado state fair in Pueblo and will go to Chicago to compete for the trip to France, which will be given to the winning team in the national canning contest for boys' and girls' clubs.

The achievements of these girls at Pueblo are worthy of mention and are the result of several years of patient effort in their home community and county.

The Kit Carson county farm bureau in co-operation with Miss Amelia Alexander, county club leader, has featured club work as one of the main projects. As a result of their efficient work, practically every farm home in the county does its own canning. Each Saturday afternoon for several years these girls have given demonstrations in store buildings, where country women came to rest and learn to can.

In the contest demonstrations at Pueblo they canned a rear quarter of pork in one hour, a crate of peaches in three-quarters of an hour and one-half bushel of beans in three-quarters of an hour. It is fully expected they will maintain Colorado's high standing in club work at the national contest in Chicago during the International stock show.

IOWA FARMERS LIKE SOY BEANS IN CORN

Young Pigs Turned Into Field Make Remarkable Growth—Necro Trouble Disappears.

The results of the farm bureau campaign for home-grown protein in the way of soy beans in corn for hogging down are pleasing Iowa farmers. A well-known farmer of Gower township, who is trying beans for the first time, says: "About a month ago I turned 288 head of spring and summer shoats in 32 acres of corn and soy beans planted about the first of June. The beans were about right to hog down at that time. So I routed them out for ringing and say, I never had a bunch of hogs in my life that showed the thrift, growth and gain that this 228 head did. If I had weighed them when I put them in and then weighed them when I took out the first carload I dare say we could not have believed the scales. I have been bothered with necro in my hogs for the last few years in a moderate form. This fall, after turning these shoats in on these soy beans, I noticed the excrement from these took on an entirely different color and form than ever before. For about two weeks it looked like excrement that follows pilling. After that it appeared in a normal form for hogs in cornfield. By letting the hogs in early this way they get very little corn and pasture on beans and grass. So in about three weeks they have learned to haul down full feed for themselves. After getting on full feed they pasture on the beans lighter or use them about like they would tankage. They eat vines and all as long as beans are green. After that they seem to eat beans only."

REPRESENTATION IN LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Foreign Organizations Appeal to American Farmers to Help Secure Recognition.

On the belief that the standing of agriculture in the League of Nations tribunal at The Hague affects American agricultural interests, even though the United States is not a member of the League of Nations, foreign agricultural organizations are appealing to American farmers to assist in getting the same representation for agriculture that other industries already have.

The international court at The Hague has decided that questions regarding agriculture that come up before the league are to be dealt with by the international labor board of the league at Geneva.

An explanation of the situation, written by Dr. E. Laur, secretary of the Swiss Farmers' association, is forwarded to the American Farm Bureau federation by Frederic Rohner, who was a delegate from the Swiss organization at the last annual meeting of the farm bureau. Doctor Laur says:

"During the war the French peasants stood in the trenches, while the majority of the industrial workers remained in the factories earning bigger wages than ever in peace time. At the end of the war the industrial labor organizations contrived to secure for themselves, as the 'spoils of war' the 'eight-hour working day.' The farmers and their leaders were still at the front. Nobody was there to defend their interests in the treaty of Versailles. During this time the leaders of the factory workers got together and secretly laying the basis for the international labor board they inclosed in the scheme the clauses which now give them the opportunity to extend the eight-hour day also to agriculture. In order to camouflage their actual aim, the agreement mentioned only 'industry.' However, in their secret discussions they made provisions to include 'agriculture' in the term 'industry.' The authorized ministers discussing the peace treaty could not go into all these details and most probably they themselves had no knowledge of what had been agreed to by the 'labor experts.' This brings it about that today France herself has to appeal against the treaty of Versailles and that her appeal is declined by reason of these 'secret' minutes of the secret meetings of the experts.

"It is to the interest of farmers the world over to unite in protest against this decision. Had the intention to bring agriculture under the jurisdiction of the international labor board been openly stated at the time the treaty of Versailles was being discussed, the league would never have been allowed to be [illegible]"

Highway Improvement

BRING CITY MONEY TO FARMS

Along Every Important Improved Road in the Country Are Signs Offering Produce.

"Mother's pin money," the odd dimes and quarters that the farm wife gleaned from a precarious market in the old days, has blossomed into a fund to send the boys and girls away to agricultural college or put a new mower on that south forty.

No longer need the Saturday trip to town be marred by last minute efforts to tuck in the last dozen eggs or the butter crock. The era of spring wagon pilgrimages to trade in the surplus product of the hen-house and the milking shed, has vanished. The David Harum of today operates in his own "front yard"—and at a greater profit.

Good roads have linked the city consumer to the farm. Along every important hard surfaced highway in the country are signs offering everything from ice cold buttermilk to pork on the hoof. Where the housewife used to bargain for hours with the crossroads storekeeper for a return of perhaps 15 cents a dozen on her eggs, she now delivers them to a passing motorist for double that amount.

A week of churning to buy the promised "silk dress" has given way to a good day's salesmanship at the roadside market.

Concrete Roads Unite the Farm Producer and the City Consumer.

Many young boys and girls are paying their way through college with funds raised during the summer and fall in this manner. The photograph illustrating this article shows a Cook county, Illinois, farmer disposing of a robust turk to a city housewife.

MANY CRASH CROSSING GATES

One Barrier on Long Island Railroad Is Broken Every Day—Drivers Want to Beat Trains.

Thousands of motorists annually smash through gates at railroad crossings in the United States. This fact indicates two sides to the grade-crossing argument.

On the Long Island railroad, which has only 400 miles of track, one grade crossing gate is broken practically every day in the year by motor drivers who attempt to "beat trains to crossings."

In the last year there were approximately 300 of such accidents on this line alone, according to T. P. Brennan, safety agent. From August 15 to 20 of this year there were 15 such mishaps on this road, resulting in injuries to many persons. One was killed.

Railroads of the United States are in a campaign to cut down accidents of all kinds, including those at grade crossings. Motorists are asked to enter this campaign and aid in making our highways safer by constant vigilance.

"How in the name of heaven," said Mr. Brennan, "can the Long Island or any other railroad render safe and prompt service to its patrons when the public highways are infested with motorcar drivers who refuse to exercise caution when approaching railroad grade crossings, who gloat over the fact that they 'beat the train to these intersections,' and who are daily apparently willing to sacrifice not only their own lives but the lives of those intrusted to their care?"

PLAN FOR BETTER HIGHWAYS

Ninety-Two Per Cent of Roads Are Dirt—Why Not Improve and Save Transportation?

Although good road building is making progress in every state in the Union at the end of another five-year period not more than 8 per cent of the roads of the country will be surfaced. [illegible] per cent of the roads over which the products of the farms must be hauled will be dirt roads. That being the case, why not have good dirt roads and save transportation costs?

SELECTION OF SITE FOR ICE HOUSE

Ice House Is Useful Piece of Equipment on Any Farm.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

While the ice house is a common thing among the outbuildings now found on many farms, yet there are many farms which do not have it. Farmers not enjoying this useful piece of equipment have need to consider, as fall comes along, what arrangements should be made so that they may have a place ready to store ice when cold weather arrives.

The selection of a site for an ice house is very important. Other conditions being suitable, the ice house on a dairy farm should be placed as near as possible to the milk house, in order to reduce the labor of handling and to encourage the more liberal use of ice. On a general farm the ice house should be located near the residence. To facilitate drainage the ground on which the ice house stands should be porous and slope away from the building. Advantage also may be taken of the nearness of hills, trees, or buildings, which often afford protection from hot winds, thus saving ice.

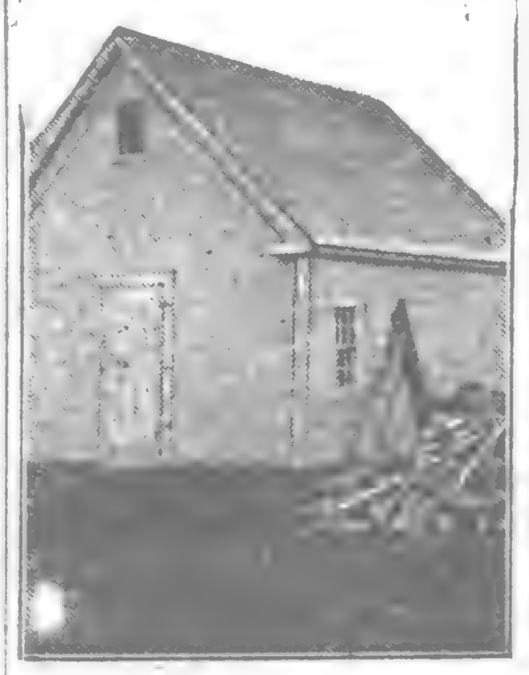
Type of Building.

The construction of the ice house depends to a great extent upon local conditions, the size of the house, and the difficulty of obtaining ice. These factors help to determine the sum that may wisely be spent for such a building. Where ice is expensive or hard to obtain, a better constructed and insulated and therefore more expensive ice house is advisable. Where natural ice can be harvested and stored cheaply a cheap structure is usually satisfactory, and the loss from melting ice is a small consideration.

The cost of harvesting and storing, the interest on the money invested, and repairs and depreciation on the building, are to be considered in relation to the ice loss from melting; and the type of house to be built depends upon these factors. It never pays to build permanently in other than a substantial manner, and careful thought should be given the matter before erecting a cheap makeshift that will not give adequate service.

Getting in the Ice Crop for Next Summer.

An ice house should be built where it will be shielded as much as possible from the wind and from the direct rays of the sun. The object is to prevent the outside heat from passing into the interior and melting the ice; consequently every effort must be made to resist the passage of heat by placing in the walls a material or a form of construction which will reduce the transfer of heat from the outside to the inside. No material known will entirely prevent the passage of heat, but several kinds of material, called non-conductors or insulators, offer a high resistance to its passage. The best insulators appear to be those that contain entrapped air in the greatest number of small spaces.



Farmer's Ice House With Milk Room.

Size of the Ice House.

As to the size, this must depend upon the amount of ice that will be needed. A cubic foot of ice weighs about 57 pounds, so in storing ice it is customary to allow from 40 to 50 cubic feet per ton for the mass of ice, but the quantity that an ice house of a given size will hold depends upon the manner in which the ice is stored. Generally speaking, in the north it will take one and one-half tons for cooling the milk from each cow, and two tons per cow in the South. Allowing 50 cubic feet for a ton of packed ice, ten tons will require about 500 cubic feet of space.

Detailed figures as to capacity, together with directions and building plans, are found in literature issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, which is always ready to answer inquiries on this as on other subjects pertaining to farm practice.

TREATMENT PREVENTS MOLD IN BUTTER TUB

Cause of Much Annoyance and Source of Big Losses.

Receptacle Is Steamed for Thirty Seconds and Inner Surface Paraffined and Rubbed With Salt—Meets Need of Creameries.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The growth of mold on butter in tubs is a cause of great annoyance to dealers and a common source of loss to creameries. Preventive treatments designed to do away with this trouble have been devised by various people, [illegible] by the United States Department of Agriculture. [illegible]

[illegible] soaked in water and steamed for 30 seconds with live steam, and lined with liners that had been dipped in a saturated solution of boiling brine, developed very little mold; but results were still better when paraffin and salt were used as described above.

BENEFITS OF FALL PLOWING

It Gives Better Distribution of Work, Relieving Rush During the Spring Season.

There are several advantages to fall plowing. It gives a better distribution of farm work, relieving the spring rush. Soils that are inclined to be wet and cold will warm up and be ready for working earlier in the spring if fall plowed. LESSON FOR DECEMBER 3

JESUS SENDING OUT MISSIONARIES

LESSON TEXT—Luke 10:1-24.

GOLDEN TEXT—The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth laborers into the harvest.—Luke 10:2.

REFERENCE MATERIAL — Matthew 10:1-42.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Jesus Sends Out Seventy Helpers.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Sends Forth Seventy Missionaries.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Heralds of the Kingdom.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Our Home Mission Work.

I. The Seventy Sent Forth (vv. 1, 2).

1. Appointed by the Lord (v. 1). Only those should go forth who are appointed by the Lord.

2. Sent Forth Two by Two (v. 1). The purpose of this was that they might mutually help, counsel and support each other.

3. Reason for Their Appointment (v 2). The harvest was great, but the laborers were few. The task before the Christian church after nearly 1900 years is still great.

4. Pray the Lord to Send Forth Laborers (v. 2). The realization of the prodigious task before us will cause us to pray to the Lord to send forth more laborers.

II. Instructions Given (vv. 3-16).

1. He Reveals the Dangers Confronting Them (v. 3). They were thrust forth by the Lord to proclaim His name, though so doing would expose them to deadly peril, even as lambs surrounded by hungry wolves. It maters not what the dangers are if the Lord sends forth.

2. Free From All Incumbrance (v. 4). The mission was urgent, so all that would in any way hinder the speedy execution of the task was to be left behind.

3. Distraction of Social Intercourse to Be Omitted (v. 41). Eastern salutations were long-drawn affairs. To go into such formalities would delay Christ's messengers.

4. Behavior in the Homes Where Received (vv. 5-9). (1) Offer the peace of the gospel (vv. 5, 6). This is to be done regardless as to whether it will be received or not. There is a reflex blessedness in preaching the gospel. Even when the message is rejected the effort is not wasted, but comes back to the one who has made the effort. (2) Do not shift quarters (vv. 7, 8). Missionaries should remain in the home where they have been received, content with what is given them. They should not demand better food and more comfortable quarters than what is commonly provided. However, that which is given should be gratefully received, for the laborer is worthy of his hire. (3) Healed the sick (v. 9). These disciples were given power to heal the sick. The ministers of Christ should seek to give relief to those in distress and use every opportunity to proclaim the gospel message.

5. The Awful Fate of Those Who Reject Christ's Message (vv. 10-16). Their case is more hopeless than that of Sodom. Those who reject Christ's messengers reject Christ.

III. The Return of the Seventy (vv. 17-24).

1. Their Report (v. 17). They were highly elated. They seemed to be agreeably surprised. They not only found that they could heal the sick, but cast out demons also. They seemed to be filled with self-satisfaction. It is easy even in Christian service to be spoiled by our successes.

2. Jesus' Answer (vv. 18-24). (1) He told them it was no surprise to Him (vv. 18, 19). With prophetic eye He saw their success as indicating that time when the prince of this world would be overthrown (John 12:31). By virtue of His mighty triumph over Satan He assures them that they need have no fear of what should befall them. Nothing could harm them; nothing could prosper which opposed them. Indeed, nothing can harm the servant who goes about His Master's business. (2) Real cause for rejoicing (v. 20). He promptly rebuked them, telling them that their chief joy should be because of their heavenly relation, not because of these [illegible] gifts. That above all which should provoke gratitude is the fact that God has chosen in Christ and saved us, inscribing our names in heaven. (3) Jesus' exultation (vv. 21, 22). The consciousness that soon the victory would be won [illegible] all [illegible] as men [illegible] know the Father, [illegible] in what was being [illegible]. (4) Congratulates the [illegible] (vv. 23, 24).

"Up In The Clouds"

What is declared to be the largest theatrical attraction that has ever visited this section is booked to appear at the Majestic, Fort Wayne, two days starting Saturday December 9 with matinee Sunday By a special arrangement the management of the theatre has guaranteed Jos. M. Gaites', the big New York producer, a huge sum in return for which the metropolitan showman is sending his original New York, Chicago and Boston company and production of "Up in the Clouds" on the above scheduled date.

"Up in the Clouds" spent the largest portion of the season at the Lyric and Forty-fourth street theatres, New York and Garrick theater, Chicago. It is the same identical organization that is coming this way. There are eighty-two persons in the big spectacle which carries its own special symphony orchestra and requires four double length railroad baggage cars to transport its paraphernalia from stand to stand. No attempt to cart such a huge outfit about the country has ever been made before and it is only because of special inducements that Mr. Gaites was prevailed upon to make the booking.

Despite the usual magnitude of "Up in the Clouds" the announcement is made that a moderate scale of prices will prevail. In fact the tariff will be much less than that in vogue during the New York and Chicago runs when three-fifty and four dollars were the top prices. The exact scale for the impending engagement will be announced in due time

Mr. Gaites will be remembered as the producer of "Take It From Me" and "Three Twins." W. B. Johnstone author of "Take It From Me" is likewise responsible for the book of "Up in the Clouds." Tom Johnstone, composer of "Molly Darling" and "Gimme A Thrill" provided the score of the new Gaites' extravaganza.

Mail orders sent to the theatre management will be given prompt attention. In fact [illegible] patrons are requested to [illegible] method as [illegible] for this booking will not be accepted. [illegible]

Out-of-town guests are: Marie Morr, Auburn, Dorothy Thompson and Maurine Hadsell of Hicksville, O.

Watch for the attendance report next week.

CLASS NOTES

FRESHMEN:

Yesterday when we went to English class we were surpeised to hear that we were expected to write on the very same test questions that we had had on the previous Wednesday. Result: all of us realized that we had not heeded the much given advice that we should always review the points in which we have failed.

We have been busily preparing our program for morning exercises. W. E. B.

SOPHOMORE:

Mr. Maxwell (after having given the Civics class their test papers.) All who have any misspelled words go to the board and write them as you have them, then write the correct form. A rush to the board was the result. Such words as these were seen: machin, hoo, distric and sherif. Please Mr. Maxwell, don't humiliate us again before visitors.

We have now completed our work on Shakespeare's "As You Like It." This completes all of our required Classic work for the first semester. L. E. K.

SENIOR:

We have completed the Indiana addition to our Civics text. Now we expect to take up the regular text again.

We have been having a very interesting and thorough study of the Revolutionary war.

A heated argument took place in Physics class. The question was as follows: If a stone is dropped into a hole bored through the center of the earth, would it gradually decrease in speed and stop at the center, or would it pass beyond the center almost to the other side, gradually decreasing in velocity, and rebounding up and down until the attraction becomes so great that it will come to a halt at the center of the earth? Anyone needing mental exercise might give this same consideration. R. W.

JUNIOR:

Practical knowledge gained in Physics class: A foot-pound is the term applied to the amount of effort necessary to raise a weight of one pound to a height of one foot. We found that a person weighing 150 pounds who ascending a flight of stairs ten feet high, expends 1500 foot pounds of work during one ascension. Just as much work is expended in descending as in ascending. We relate this fact simply because we think it interesting and not to display what knowledge we have attained.

We lead the spelling averages this week, but by a very small margin. This is the result of the strenuous class competition that has been especially noticeable during the last few weeks. We, in the interest of our school, wish to encourage this spirit. We do not owe our occasional success to any special ability, but to unified effort, which, if practised by all of our classes will make the work more interesting to all. R. J.

High lights on Highways

Federal-aid roads placed under construction in September amounted to 1,189 miles.

At the beginning of 1922 there were 4.2 motor vehicles for each mile of road in the United States.

From 19 to 35 cents per hour is the range of wages for common labor on Federal-aid roads east of the Rocky Mountains, with a few exceptions, where as high as 43 cents is paid.

The Bureau of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agriculture states that there are enough motor vehicles in the United States to take the entire population for a ride at one time.

Recently a tourist in passing through four states was required to buy four different sets of lenses in order that his headlights would comply with state laws. More uniformity in highway regulation is needed.

How climate affects the highway working season is shown by the fact that grading can be done on 100 days of the year in western Oregon, 101 in Maine, 260 in Maryland, and 300 in several of the southern states.

One hundred and twenty vehicles a minute was the rate at which motor vehicles passed an observing station on a trunk-line highway in Massachusetts, according to the Bureau of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agricluture. This rate was kept up from noon to 10 p. m.

CHAPTER XIV

Chacherre's Bundle.

It was seven in the morning when Henry Gramont drove his car into Houma.

In the wire which he had sent over Chacherre's signature he had commanded Dick Hearne to meet Gramont at about this time at a restaurant near the court house. Putting his car at the curb, Gramont went into the restaurant and ordered a hasty breakfast. He had brought with him copies of the morning papers, and was perusing the accounts of Bob Maillard's pitifully weak story regarding his father's murder, when a stranger stopped beside him.

"Gramont?" said the other. "Thought it was you. Hearne's my name—I had orders to meet you. What's up?"

The other man dropped into the chair opposite Gramont, who put away his papers. Hearne was a sleek individual of pasty complexion who evidently served the gang in no better light than as a go-between and runner of errands. That he suspected nothing was plain from his casual manner, although he had never seen Gramont previously.

"Business," said Gramont, leaning back to let the waitress serve his breakfast. When she had departed, he attacked it hungrily. "You got Chacherre's wire about the stuff in his car?" Was it burned?"

"No. He countermanded it just as I was hirin' a car to go over to Paradis," said Hearne. "What's stirrin', anyhow?"

"Plenty. Memphis Izzy's coming down today. When'll he get in?"

"He'll go direct to the other place, won't come here. Oh, I reckon he'll get there along about nine this morning. Why?"

"We'll have to go over there to meet him," said Gramont. "I stopped in here to pick you up. Hammond is still safe in jail?"

"Sure." Hearne laughed evilly. "I don't guess he'll get out in a hurry, neither!"

"Chacherre was pinched last night for the murder," said Gramont, watching the other.

"The h—l!" Hearne looked astonished, then relaxed and laughed again. "Some fly cop will sure lose his buttons, then! They ain't got nothin' on him."

"I heard they had plenty."

"Don't worry." Hearne waved a hand grandiloquently. "The boss is solid with the bunch up to Baton Rouge, and they'll take care of everybody. So old Ben got pinched, huh? That's one joke, man!"

Gramont's worst suspicions were confirmed by the attitude of Hearne, who plainly considered that the entire gang had nothing to fear from the law. Chacherre's boasts were backed up solidly. It was obvious to Gramont that the ramifications of the gang extended very high up, indeed.

"Better cut out the talk," he said, curtly, "until we get out of here."

Hearne nodded and rolled a cigarette.

When his hasty meal was finished, Gramont paid at the counter and led the way outside. He motioned toward the car, and Hearne obediently climbed in, being evidently of so little account in the gang that he was accustomed to taking orders from everyone.

Gramont headed out of town and took the Paradis road. Before he had driven a mile, however, he halted the car, climbed out, and lifted one side of the hood.

"Give me those rags from the bottom of the car, Hearne," he said, briefly.

The other obeyed. As Gramont made no move to come and get them, Hearne got out of the car; then Gramont rose from the engine unexpectedly, and Hearne looked into a pistol.

"Hold out your hands behind you and turn around!" snapped Gramont. "No talk!"

Hearne uttered an oath, but as the pistol jerked at him he obeyed the command. Gramont took the strip of cloth, which he had previously prepared and bound the man's wrists.

"These are better than [illegible]," he [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] under the wheel again and proceeded on his way. Hearne's lashings were inconspicuous to any one whom the car passed.

It was a little after eight in the morning when Gramont drove into Paradis. He noticed that two large automobiles were standing in front of the post office, and that about them were a group of men who eyed him and his car with some interest. Paying no attention to these, he drove on through the town without a halt.

Sweeping out along the north road, he encountered no one. When at length he reached the Ledanois farm he drove in toward the deserted house and parked the car among some trees where it could not be seen from the road.

Leaving the car, Gramont took his way toward the bank of the bayou and followed this in the direction of the adjoining property.

He went on to an opening in the bushes which, over the low rail fence, gave him a clear view of the Gumberts property. There he paused, quickly drew back, and gained a point whence he could see without danger of his presence being discovered. He settled into immobility and watched.

That Memphis Izzy himself had not yet arrived, he was fairly certain. Near the barn were drawn up two flivvers, and sitting in chairs on the cottage veranda were three men who must have come in these cars. Gramont had come provided with binoculars, and got these out. He was not long in discovering that all three men on the veranda were strangers to him. They, no doubt, were men in the lottery game, waiting for Gumberts to arrive. Gramont turned his attention to the other buildings.

Both the barn and shop were open, and the buzzing thrum of machinery bore witness that the mechanics were hard at work upon the stolen cars. Gramont thought of Ben Chacherre, still tied and lashed to the chair in his room, and wondered what was to be found under the rear seat of Ben's car. He could see the car from where he lay.

Almost on his thought, a high-powered and noiseless car came sweeping down the road and he knew at once that Memphis Izzy had arrived. He knew it intuitively, even before he obtained a good glimpse of the broad, heavy figure and the dominating features. Memphis Izzy was far from handsome, but he possessed character.

"Where's the Goog?" As he left the car, which he had driven himself, Gumberts lifted his voice in a bull-like roar that carried clearly to Gramont. "Where's Charlie the Goog?"

The mechanics appeared hurriedly. One of them, no other than Gramont's friend of the adenoidal aspect, who seemed to own the mellifluous title of Charlie the Goog, hastened to the side of Gumberts, and the latter gave him evident directions regarding some repair to the car. Then, turning, Memphis Izzy strode to the cottage. He nodded greetings to the four men who awaited him, took a bunch of keys from his pocket and opened the cottage door. All five vanished within.

Gramont rose. A moment previously, fever had thrilled him; the excitement of the manhunt had held him trembling. Now he was cool again, his fingers touching the pistol in his pocket, his eyes steady. He glanced at his watch and nodded.

"It's time!" he murmured. "Let's hope there'll be no slipup! All ready, Memphis Izzy. So am I. Let's go!"

Unhurried and openly, he advanced, making his leisurely way toward the barn and shop. Charlie the Goog, who was bent over the car of Gumberts, was first to discern his approach, and straightened up. Gramont waved his hand in greeting. Charlie the Goog turned his head and called his brethren, who came into sight, staring at Gramont.

The latter realized that if he passed them the game was won. If they stopped him, he bade fair to lose everything.

"Hello, boys!" he called, cheerily, as he drew near. "I came out on an errand for the boss—got a message for Gumberts. Where is he? In the house?"

The others nodded, plainly mistrusting him, yet puzzled by his careless manner and his reference to Fell.

"Sure," answered Charlie the Goog. "Go right in—he's in the big front room."

"Thanks."

Gramont continued his way, conscious that they were staring after him. If there was anything phony about him, they evidently considered that Memphis Izzy would take care of the matter very ably.

The steps of the cottage porch creaked protestingly as Gramont ascended them. [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] ing the room and the men inside. Startled, all four of them had risen and were staring at him. In his other hand he produced an automatic which he had taken from Dick Hearne.

"The first word from any of you gentlemen," he declared, "will draw a shot. I'm doing all the talking here. Savvy?"

They stood staring, paralyzed by this apparition. They had been sitting about the table, which was heaped with papers and with packages of money. A large safe in the wall stood open. Beside the table was a small mail sack, partially emptied of its contents; torn envelopes littered the floor.

That this was the headquarters of at least a section of the lottery gang Gramont saw without need of explanation.

"You're under arrest," said Gramont, quietly. "The game's up, Gumberts. Hands up, all of you! Dick Hearne has peached on the whole gang, and from the boss down you're all in for a term in stir. You with the derby! Take Gumberts' gun, and those of your companions, then your own; throw 'em on the floor in the corner, and if you make the wrong kind of a move, heaven help you! Step lively, there!"

Each man there had a revolver or pistol, and one by one the weapons clattered into the corner. Gumberts stood motionless, licking his thick lips, unuttered curses in his glaring eyes. And in that instant Gramont heard the porch steps creak and caught a low, startled cry.

"Hey, boss! They's a gang comin' on the run—"

It was Charlie the Goog, bursting in upon them in wild haste. Gramont stepped into the room and turned slightly, covering with one of his weapons the intruder, who stood aghast in the doorway as he comprehended the scene.

No words passed. Staring at the five men, then at Gramont, the adenoidal mechanic gulped once—and like a flash acted. He ducked low and fired from his pocket. Gramont fired at the same instant, and the heavy bullet, catching Charlie the Goog squarely in the chest, hurled his body half across the room.

With the shots Memphis Izzy flung himself forward in a headlong rush. That desperate shot of the little mechanic had broken Gramont's right arm above the wrist; before he could fire a second time, with the weapon in his left hand, Gumberts had wrested the pistol aside and was struggling with him. The other four came into the melee full weight.

Gramont went down under a crashing blow. Over him leaped Memphis Izzy and rushed into the doorway—then stopped with astounding abruptness and lifted his arms. After him the other four followed suit. Two men, panting a little, stood outside the door and covered them with shotguns.

"Tie 'em, boys," said Gramont, rising dizzily to his feet. "No, I'm not hurt—my arm's broken, I think, but let that wait. Got the ones outside?"

A stamping of feet filled the hall, and other men appeared there.

"Got two of 'em, Gramont!" responded the leader. "The third slipped in here—ah, there he is!"

Poor Charlie the Goog lay dead on the floor—a touch of heroic tragedy in his last desperate action; the one great action of his life, possibly. He had realized that it meant doom, yet he had done what he could.

"I think that's all," said Gramont. "We've sure made a killing, boys—and it's a good thing you jumped in to the minute! A second later and they'd have done for me. Take care of that evidence, will you? Get that mail sack and the letters particularly; if they've been working their lottery outside the state, it'll be a federal matter."

Gumberts, who was being tied up with his friends, uttered a hoarse cry.

"Who are you guys? You can't do this without authority—"

"Don't be silly, Memphis Izzy," said Gramont, smiling a little, then twitching to the pain of his arm. "These friends of mine are members with me of the American Legion, and they've come along at my request to put you crooks where you belong. As for authority, you can ask and go hang.

"Here, boys, I've got to get out to that barn. Come along, some of you!"

He led the way out to the barn and, the others trooping in behind him, entered. He pointed out the car which had brought Chacherre here previously, and ordered the extra seat in the back opened up.

"I think there's a bundle inside," he said. "What's in it, I don't know—"

"Here we are, cap."

A bundle was produced, and opened. In it was found the aviator's costume which Gramont had worn as the Midnight Masquer, and which [illegible] with the loot. [illegible]

WHAT INDUCTANCE MEANS EXPLAINED

Its Cause and Effects Are Here Told in Popular Language for the Novice.

When a conductor cuts a magnetic field a voltage is induced in the conductor. The voltage induced depends for its value on the rapidity with which the conductor cuts the magnetic field. The value of the induced voltage is a function of the rate of cutting, not of the field density, etc.

A conductor carrying a current is surrounded by a magnetic field. If the value of the current be decreased, the magnetic field will decrease. In decreasing, the magnetic field about the conductor will cut the conductor and induce in it a voltage. This induced voltage in a conductor caused by a change in the magnetic field, which was produced by the conductor, is called the electro-motive force of self-induction. The direction of the induced voltage due to self-induction is such as to oppose any change.

Looking at the end of a conductor, if applied current is in a direction away from the observer, a reduction in current will produce an e. m. f. of self-induction that will add to this current flow away from the observer, or being the same direction as the applied voltage. An increase in the flow of the current will increase the magnetic field and an e. m. f. of self-induction will be induced that will oppose the flow of current.

Suppose we consider the magnetic field about a conductor carrying an alternating current. The current alternately flows in one direction and then the other direction. Each time the direction of flow of the current changes, the direction of the magnetic field reverses.

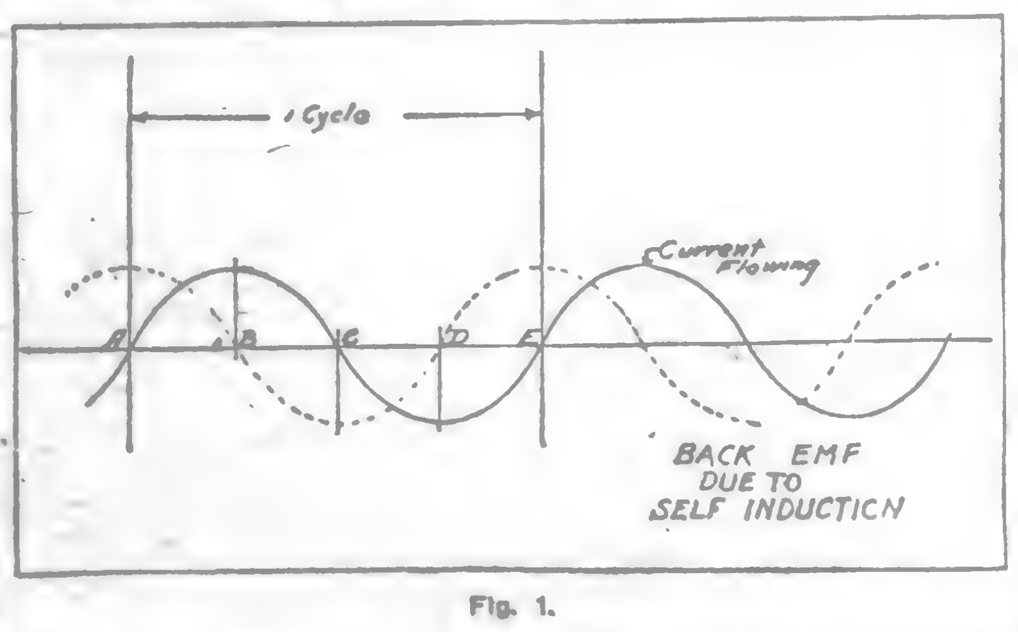

Fig. 1.

When an alternating current flows in a conductor, the current which is set up by the changing magnetic field is also alternating. Suppose that Fig. 1 represents a graph of the current flowing in the conductor. During the first quarter of the cycle, while the current is increasing from zero at A to a maximum value at B, the magnetic field will build up with the current. The inductive back e. m. f., which depends on the rate of change of flow, will be a maximum at A, where the flux is changing most rapidly, and a minimum at B, where change in flow is zero. Similarly during the other three quarters of a cycle the induced e. m. f. due to induction will be a maximum at C and E and a minimum at D.

The dotted curve then in Fig. 1 represents the e. m. f., of self-induction. Note that there is a phase difference of one-quarter of a cycle, or 90 electrical degrees, between the e. m. f., due to induction and the current producing the magnetic field. This action of the conductor having a back e. m. f. induced in it, when a varying current flows through the conductor is called self-induction.

In other words, self-induction may be defined as the property of an electrical circuit that tends to prevent any change in the value of the circuit flowing through it. The e. m. f. of self-induction is always in such a direction as to prevent any change of current in the circuit. A length of wire wound in the form of a coil called a solenoid has a greater self-induction than the same length of straight. The self-induction of a coil with an iron near [illegible] of the circuit. The unit of inductance is the henry. An electrical circuit has an inductance of one henry, when a change in the current of one ampere per second will cause a back e. m. f. of one volt.

It has been explained that an ever [illegible] field surrounds a [illegible] an alternating current [illegible] magnetic field [illegible] a back e. m. f. [illegible] in the current [illegible].

[illegible]

[illegible] tween two circuits linked by a magnetic field but separated electrically.

Examples of both types of inductance are found in both high and low frequencies. In a radiophone transmitter the filter reactances are examples of low frequency self-induction. The filament transformer is an example of mutual inductance. The primary of the filament transformer sets up a magnetic field that is cut by the conductor that forms the secondary of the transformer. In radio frequency circuits a tuning coil depends for its action upon self-induction. The operation of a loose coupler depends upon mutual induction for the transfer of energy from the primary or antenna circuit to the secondary tuned circuit to which the rectifying apparatus is connected.

"Skin effect" is due to self-induction. In a conductor carrying direct current, resistance drop, which can be considered as a back voltage, is constant over the entire cross section of the conductor. The applied voltage then is opposed at any point on the cross section of a conductor by the same back voltage and hence the current flowing distributes itself evenly over the cross section of the conductor.

This is not true in conductors carrying alternating current. There are two voltages that oppose the flow of alternating current in a conductor. First, the back voltage due to resistance, and second, the back voltage induced by self-induction. The magnetic field surrounding the conductor will be strongest at the center of the conductor and weaker at the surface of the conductor. This will cause the induced back e. m. f. to be largest at the center and smallest at the surface of the conductor. Naturally the density of the circuit that flows will be inversely proportional to this opposing e. m. f. or the least current will flow at the center and the greater current will flow along the surface.

As the frequency of the current is increased, the "skin effect," as it is called, becomes more and more pronounced. Finally at radio frequencies such a small quantity of current flows near the center of the conductor that the conductive material there is useless and can be removed. For this reason tubing is often used for conducting high power at high frequencies.

Loose connections, poor insulation, poor ground, poor joints and wires, worn insulation, wires crossing, and many other small matters may put a set completely out of commission.

SPENT HALF HER TIME IN BED

Farmer's Wife Tells How Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Made Her a Well Woman

Carter's Creek, Tenn.—"Three years ago I was almost an invalid. I spent half of my time in bed, being afflicted with a trouble which women of a certain age are apt to have. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Tablets and used Lydia E. Pinkham's Sanative Wash. I am a well woman now and have been for two years. I can work as well as any one who is younger and as I am a farmer's wife I have plenty to do for I cultivate my own garden, raise many chickens and do my own housework. You may publish this letter as I am ready to do anything to help other women as I have been so well and happy since my troubles are past."—Mrs. E. T. GALLOWAY, Carter's Creek, Tenn.

Most women find plenty to do. If they are upset with some female ailment and troubled with such symptoms as Mrs. Galloway had, the smallest duty seems a mountain.

If you find it hard to keep up, if you are nervous and irritable, without ambition and out of sorts generally, give the Vegetable Compound a fair trial. We believe it will help you greatly, for it has helped others.

Seen and Heard In Indiana

Jeffersonville.—Following an inspection of the Jeffersonville plant, officers from the main office of the American Car and Foundry company said that the work on hand would keep the plant busy for two years, and the force of 700 men employed here may be increased. Another order of fifty steel passenger cars for the Chicago & Northwestern railroad, and an order for about 200 wooden cars to be used in Cuba for hauling sugar cane from the plantations to the mills have been received. Large orders for the repair and the reconstruction of freight cars are being handled here.

Shoals.—Because Edgar Witcher, cashier of the Martin County bank, was kind to Mrs. Martha Mercer, and, as she expresses it in her will, provided an easy chair for her to sit in while transacting business in the bank, he receives a considerable sum of money by her will. Mrs. Mercer was a widow, without near relatives. In the will she makes a specific bequest of $200 to Mr. Witcher, and then makes him one of the five residuary legatees. Her estate will amount to about $7,000, and Mr. Witcher's share will be about $1,000.

Franklin.—Interest in Johnson county is centered in the appointment of a postmaster at Franklin. The term of A. B. Weyl expired September 5, but Congressman Benham, busy with his campaign, deferred the appointment of a successor. Three aspirants for the office are George Jeffrey, Republican county chairman; Marshall Barnard, formerly Republican county chairman, and James Robinson, an attorney of Franklin.

Jeffersonville.—Mrs. Carrie Messener, of Louisville, has filed suit in the Clark Circuit court against Mrs. Nancy Egland, of Jeffersonville, to set aside an order of the court for adoption by Mrs. Egland of her granddaughter, Dorothy Messener, daughter of the petitioner. It is charged Mrs. Egland adopted the child and that the petitioner received no notice and did not give her consent to the adoption.

Greensburg.—Charles Watkins of Muncie, past governor of Indiana Rotary, addressed the Rotary club. He asked for the support of the Y. M. C. A., for which a membership drive will be made here during December. Frank L. Donnell, past president of the Greensburg Rotary club, was chairman at the meeting.

Franklin.—Roger Loughery has been elected commander of the Edinburg post of the American Legion. Other officers are: Oscar Wertz, vice commander; Robert Gephart, adjutant; Leo McNurney, finance officer; the Rev. W. T. Jones, chaplain, and Thomas Butler, sergeant-at-arms.

Jeffersonville.—Francis Marion Griffith of Vevay was selected as special judge to try twelve consolidated cases in the Circuit court. The cases are remonstrances against an ordinance adopted by a former city council four years ago, annexing three towns and other territory.

Vincennes.—Following the discovery of fire in the Indian Creek coal mine near Bicknell, the part of the mine containing the fire was sealed. The fire did not affect work in the other parts of the mine, officers of the company said. A bad shot is said to have caused the fire.

Portland.—Roscoe D. Wheat (Rep.), judge-elect of the Jay Circuit court, has entered on his new duties. He received his commission from the governor and secretary of state. Miss Celia Heston, court reporter under E. E. McGriff, judge of the court, has been retained.

Connersville.—A charge of involuntary manslaughter was filed in Circuit court against Edward Welch, of Harrison township, driver of an automobile which struck and fatally injured Mrs. Frances E. Jamison, age fifty-four.

Greensburg.—Charles W. Jewett, former mayor of Indianapolis, will deliver an address at the annual memorial service of Greensburg lodge No. 475, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, on December 3.

Franklin.—When the Sunday school class taught by Mrs. John A. Henderson in the Presbyterian church at Whiteland, wished to earn money with which to buy a carpet for the classroom floor, Mrs. Henderson's husband said he would give a load of corn provided the class members would shuck it. The class is composed of eight young persons, five of whom are girls, and they gladly accepted the offer. With their teacher they shucked a load of forty-six bushels, which they sold to the elevator in Whiteland for $30.

Anderson.—The Union Traction company of Indiana announced that it will enlarge its central power plant at Anderson to provide sufficient power to operate all its electric car lines of about 460 miles. When the power house is enlarged, it will require 450,000 pounds of coal a day, it was said. The capacity of the plant will be increased about 15 per cent. Additional high-tension feed lines will carry power to substations at Muncie, Union City, Bluffton, Peru, Warsaw, Newcastle and smaller towns.

Indianapolis.—Increase in rates for rural patrons of the Indiana Bell Telephone company in all cities where increased rates already have been asked is requested in an amended petition filed by the company with the public service commission, it is announced. The new rates would make the cost of a rural residence telephone $1.75 a month; rural business phone $2 with a charge of 25 cents for each two miles beyond the city limits of the exchange.

Shelbyville.—Delmon Clark, trustee of Washington township, Shelby county, was found not guilty of a charge of assault and battery on William Herrod, a neighbor, following a hearing in police court. Lee Hoop, mayor and judge of police court, in making his decision, said that the incident resulting in the charge had grown out of politics and, while a disgraceful affair, he would find Clark not guilty.

Cannelton.—The second annual farmers' short course in Perry county, under the supervision of Dr. G. M. Frier, of the Purdue experiment station, will be held December 14 and 15. The committee in charge of the short course consists of Thomas J. Groves, chairman; Thomas J. Truempy, Preston Minor and William J. Gerber.

Wabash.—A jury in the Wabash Circuit court awarded Charles Farthing $2,500 damages against the Indian Refining company. Farthing's wife was killed when she attempted to start a fire in a stove by using gasoline. It was alleged that the company sold gasoline to a Wabash firm as kerosene and that it was retailed as kerosene to Farthing.

Martinsville.—The Morgan County Corn Growers' association has elected the following officers for the coming year: Harry Goss, of Paramount, president; Andy Shireman, Martinsville, vice president; Ray Shufflebarger, Waverly, secretary; Miss Allie Cook, Martinsville, treasurer.

Winimac.—Newly elected officers of the American Legion are: Walter Mohr, post commander; Chauncey Felker, vice commander; Dwight Fites, adjutant; Earl Daniels, chaplain; Hugh Baker, sergeant-at-arms; I. D. Howard, Dr. R. C. Erb and Dr. C. E. Campbell, executive committee.

Michigan City.—Police and a deputy prosecutor at Michigan City seized an automobile load of 168 quart bottles of Canadian whisky, which was being taken from Detroit to St. Louis. The automobile carrying the whisky broke down and was towed to a local service station.

Connersville.—Thieves entered the Levinson store, New Method laundry and a slaughter house operated by Valentine Snyder. They obtained 600 pounds of beef at the slaughter house but nothing of value has been missed from the other places.

Automobile Accidents

While returning home from Spencerville Sunday evening Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Sanders upset their automobile near the William Keeler home south of town, and were both badly shaken and bruised, but otherwise escaped serious injury. The machine had not been running properly and in meeting another car the lights of which blinded Mr. Sanders causing him to turn out too far and to run off an embankment of several feet, turning the car upside down, pinning both underneath. Help soon came and Mr. Keeler brought the couple home.

Last week when Rev. R. B. Daily, accompanied by his daughter, Louetta, and Ed Storer and daughter, Hasel, were on their way to Dayton, Ohio, their automobile turned over, crushing the top and wind shield and spilling them out. None were severly injured. Mr. Daily received the greatest injury. The accident happened near Celina, Ohio.

IT WAS TEACHER'S FAULT

A school teacher received the following note: "Dear Madam please excuse my Tommy today he wont come to school because he is acting as timekeeper for his father and it is your fault. You gave him a example if a field is 5 miles around how long will it take a man walking 3½ miles per hour to walk 2¼ times around it? Tommy ain't a man so his father will walk around the field and Tommy will time him; but please don't give my boy such examples again because my husband must go to work every day to support his family."

Safe Investments!

Rest azsured of this: The greater your chances of gain on any investment, the greater your chances of loosing all that you have invested.

This is a poor time to speculate. Good investments usually bear a low rate of interest. That's why the rate is low on farm loans, Liberty bonds, municipal bonds and other like securities. The safer your investment the lower the rate. It pays to be on the safe side, even if the income is low. Our Bank buys and sells bonds, mortgages and other relibale securities in which your surplus funds may be safely invested. Ask us about them.

Davis

Samuel S. Davis, son of Joel Davis and Mary Ann McConneil Davis was born in Tuscarawas County, Ohio, April 4, 1838. He departed this life at the home of his daughter, Mrs. H. M. Widney, near St. Joe, November 29, 1922 aged 84 years, 7 months and 25 days.

His parents family consisted of fourteen children, nine of whom were boys The brothers all preceded him in death. Of the five sisters three survive, namely, Mary Ann Buchanan, of Huntsburg, O., Matilda Rodimer of Butler, Indiana and Anna Elisa Varner of Florida.

He grew up in the vicinity of his birthplace. In 1860 the gold fields of the far west attracted him and he with a companion named Benjamin Johnson went there in quest of adventure and fortune. At that time it took men of iron nerve to face the dangers of a trip across the continent. St. Joseph, Missouri, was the furthermost western terminal. From that point onward he drove an ox team facing the combined dangers of hostile Indians and white desperadoes.

In the Montana gold camps his law abiding disposition and stability of character was particularly demonstrated while a member of the Vigilance Committee. The committee dealt justice to law breakers without hesitancy. Five years were spent in the gold fields. He succeeded in returning home with his savings after many harrowing experiences.

March 16, 1865, he was united in marriage to Mary Elisabeth Jones. To this union five children were born, all of whom with the widow survive. There are two sons, Judson D. and Carlton Ray; three daughters, Hattie A., Theressa E. and Minta Mae; four grandchildren, B. V. Widney, Dorris D. Widney, deceased, Opal Mae Thomson and Rose Ann Davis and two great grandchildren, Lee Swinney Thomson and Eloise Mae Widney, deceased.

In the fall of 1866, the deceased with his wife and first child, Judson D., moved from Ohio to Indiana and settled on what is now known as the old home farm, one and one half miles east of Coburntown. Here they raised the family and lived until two years ago when because of failing health they henceforth made their home with the children.

In the winter of 1878-79 he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal church at Wesley Chapel under the pastorate of Daniel Brown. Thereafter he was active in the church work and for many years was superintendent of the Sabbath School. He was a great lover of music and always ready to do his share. His faith never faltered and his life was consistent with his faith.

All who know this man best mourn his departure to the land of everlasting life. To his neighbors he was one of sturdy character and a constant example of a true life worth while. To his family he was a true and considerate husband, a faithful father and a counselor upon whom all could depend. He was honest: he was kind: he was charitable: he loved and was loved. God gave him life and he in turn gave his life to God. What more could man do?

The funeral services were held from the home, [illegible] with interment in Riverside Cemetery. Rev. C. H. [illegible] officiating. E. R. Kinsey, [illegible]

Those from out of town who [illegible] the funeral were Mr. and Mrs. A. J. [illegible] and Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Davis, of Chicago, Mr. and Mrs. Lee L. Smith, of Portsmouth, Ohio, C. Ray Davis and wife, Mrs. Ruth Mallahan, Mrs. Lucy Widney, Mack Leighty and wife and Harry Brown and wife of Auburn, Frank Best and wife of Edon, O., Frank Stone and wife of Butler, Sherman Hart and wife, Mrs. A. E. Hart, Bernice Sauers, Joe Dorsey, Lawrence Hart and wife, Clarence Hawkins and wife and Wm. Shull and wife of Hicksville.

APPRECIATION

We greatly appreciate the comforting words, neighborly deeds, tokens of love and sympathy extended by neighbors and friends in the death and burial of our husband and father.

Thomas

Margaret Jane Thomas, daughter of Franklin and Sarah Herrick, was born in Concord Township February 2, 1859. She departed this life Nov. 29, 1922.

She was united in marriage to Nelson D. Thomas, and four children came to their home. Three of the children died young. Charles M. Thomas of Reeding, Michigan, and Charles' young daughter are the only descendents living. She leaves four brothers and one sister. They are, Daniel, Orange, Charles, Melvin and Mrs Nettie Culbertson. Less than one year ago her husband answered the call from the other world. This leaves the son bereft of father and mother.

She united with the Methodist Protestant Church February 4, 1883 under the pastorate of W. W. Lineberry. She remained a loyal member until death silenced her voice.

She was a member of the Pythian Sisters and was actively associated with this organisation. In fact, she was present at the session of the lodge in the evening before her death. She went to the home of friends for the night Mr. and Mrs. Monroe. She had been feeling as well as usual, but during the night she became very ill with hemorrage of the stomach and died within a half hour.

The funeral services were conducted from the Methodist church Friday afternoon with interment in Riverside Cemetery.

Mrs. Draggoo had been in unusually good health up until a fall of two weeks ago, which resulted in the breaking of an arm, after which she was confined to her home. She was the last surviving member of a family of thirteen, and was born Feb. 12, 1837. She was twice married, Wm. Cadwallader being her first husband and on September 25, 1873 she was married to James E Draggoo. Harry Draggoo, living at home, is the sole survivor of the immediate family.

CHAPTER XV

—21—

When the Heavens Fell.

The chief of police entered the office of Jachin Fell, high in the Maison Blanche building, at eight o'clock on Friday evening. Mr. Fell glanced up at him in surprise.

"Hello, chief! What's up?"

The officer gazed at him in astonishment.

"What's up? Why, I came around to see you, of course!"

Jashin Fell smiled whimsically. "To see me? Well, chief, that's good of you; sit down and have a cigar, eh? What's the matter? You look rather taken aback."

"I am," said the other, bluntly. "Didn't you expect me?"

"No," said Jachin Fell, halting suddenly in the act of reaching for a cigar, and turning his keen gaze upon the chief. "Expect you? No!"

"It's darned queer, then! That chap Gramont called me up about ten minutes ago and said to get around here as quick as I could make it, that you wanted to see me."

"Gramont!" Jachin Fell frowned. "Where's Ben Chacherre? Haven't you found him yet?"

"Nary a sign of him, chief."

The door opened, and Henry Gramont appeared, his right hand bandaged and in a sling.

"Good evening, gentlemen!" he said, smiling.

"Here's Gramont, now!" exclaimed Fell. "Did you call the chief over here—"

"I sure did," and Gramont came forward. "I wanted to see you two gentlemen together, and so arranged it. Miss Ledanois is to be here at nine, Fell?"

The little man nodded, his eyes intent upon Gramont. He noticed the bandaged arm.

"Yes. Have you been hurt?"

"Slightly." Gramont brought up a chair across the desk from Fell, and sat down. He put his left hand in his pocket and brought forth a document which he handed to the chief of police. "Cast your eye over that, chief, and say nothing. You're here to listen for the present. Here's something to cover your case, Mr. Fell."

Gramont produced his automatic from the pocket of his coat, and laid it on the desk before him. There was a moment of startled silence. The officer, looking over the paper which Gramont had handed him, seemed to find it of sudden, intense interest.

"What means all this mystery and melodramatic action, Gramont?" demanded Jachin Fell, a slight sneer in his eyes, his voice quite toneless.

"It means," said Gramont, regarding him steadily, "that you're under arrest. I went out to the Gumberts place on Bayou Terrebonne this morning, arrested Memphis Izzy Gumberts and four other men engaged in operating a lottery, and also arrested two mechanicians who were engaged in working on stolen cars. We took in, further, a gentleman by the name of Dick Hearne; a lesser member of the gang, who is now engaged in dictating a confession. Just a moment, chief! I prefer to do the talking at present."

Gramont smiled into the steady, unfaltering eyes of Fell.

"You are next on the program," he said, evenly. "We know that you are at the head of an organized gang, which is not only operating a lottery through this and adjacent states, but also is conducting an immense business in stolen automobiles. Therefore—"

"Just one minute, please," said Jachin Fell. "Do you forget, Mr. Gramont, the affair of the Midnight Masquer? You are a very zealous citizen, I have no doubt, but—"

"I was about to add," struck in Gramont, "that your pleasant friend Ben Chacherre is charged with the murder of the sheriff of Terrebonne parish, in which I have clear evidence against him, having been present at the scene of the crime. He is also charged with the murder of Joseph Maillard—"

"My heavens!" said Fell, staring. "I never dreamed that Chacherre—"

"Perhaps you didn't." Gramont shrugged his shoulders. "Neither did anyone else. I imagine that Ben learned of this room and drinking party, and rightly decided that he could make a rich haul off a small crowd of drunken young sports. He had the costume stolen from my car, as you know; also the automatic which went with it. Two shots were missing from the automatic when we found it in Ben's possession; and you remember the Masquer fired twice at the time Maillard was killed."

Fell's keen eyes sparkled angrily.

"You're a very zealous citizen, young man," he said, softly. "I see that you've been hurt. I trust your little game did not result in casualties?"

Gramont nodded. "Charlie the Goog went west. He was desperate, I fancy; at all events he got me in the arm, and I had to shoot him. Memphis Izzy hardly justified his tremendous reputation, for he yielded like a lamb."

"So you killed the Goog, eh?" said Fell. "Very zealous, Mr. Gramont! And I suppose that the [illegible] of the case [illegible] you, a [illegible] in carrying arms and [illegible]? [illegible]"

[illegible]

"Certainly." Gramont smiled. "You see, this lottery business has been going on for a year or more. Some time ago, before I came to New Orleans, the governor of this state appointed me a special officer to investigate the matter. There is my commission, which the chief has been reading. It gives me a good deal of power, Fell; quite enough power to gather in you and your bunch."

The chief of police looked very uneasily from Gramont to Jachin Fell, and back again. Fell sat erect in his chair, staring at Gramont.

"You were the original Midnight Masquer," said Fell in his toneless voice. At this direct charge, and at Gramont's assent, the chief started in surprise.

"Yes. One reason was that I suspected some one in society, some one high up in New Orleans, to be connected with the gang; but I never dreamed that you were the man, Fell. I rather suspected young Maillard. I am now glad to say that I was entirely wrong. You were the big boss, Fell, and you're going to serve time for it."

Fell glanced at the chief, who cleared his throat as if about to speak. At this moment, however, a sharp knock sounded at the door.

"Come!" called Gramont.

A man entered. It was one of Gramont's deputies, who happened also to be a reporter from one of the morning papers of the city. He carried several sheets of paper which he laid before Gramont. He glanced at Fell, who recognized him and exchanged a nod of greeting, then returned his attention to Gramont.

"Ah!" said the latter with satisfaction, as he examined the papers. "So Hearne has given up everything, has he? Does this confession implicate Mr. Fell, here?"

"Well, rather," drawled the other, cheerfully. "And see here, cap! There are two more of us in the crowd and we've arranged to split the story. We'd like to rush the stuff to our papers the minute you give the word, because—"

"I know." Gramont returned the papers that bore the confession of Hearne. "You've made copies of this, of course? All right. Shoot the stuff in to your papers right away, if you wish."

Fell raised a hand to check the other.

"One moment, please!" he said, his eyes boring into the newspaper man. "Will you also take a message from me to the editor of your newspaper—and see that it goes to the others as well?"

"If Mr. Gramont permits, yes."

"Go ahead," said Gramont, wondering what Fell would try now. He soon learned.

"Then," pursued Fell, evenly, "you will kindly inform the editors of your papers that, in case my name appears in connection with this matter, I shall immediately institute suit for libel. No matter what Mr. Gramont may say or do, I assure you fully that no publicity is going to attach to me in this matter. Neither, I may add, am I going to be arrested. That is all, sir."

Gramont smiled. "Take the message if you see fit, by all means," he said, carelessly. "You may also take my fullest assurance that within twenty minutes you will observe Mr. Fell safely in jail. That's all."

The newspaper man saluted and departed, grinning.

Gramont leaned forward, the harsh lines of his face spelling determination as he looked at Jachin Fell.

"So you won't be arrested, eh? Let's see. I know that this gang of yours has influence running up into high places, and that this influence has power. That is why I was appointed to investigate this lottery game secretly, and in my own way. That is why, also, I brought the chief of police here tonight."

He turned to the perturbed officer, and spoke coldly.

"Now, chief, you've seen my authority, you've heard my charges, and you know they will be proved up to the hilt. Are you willing to arrest Jachin Fell, or not?"

The chief cleared his throat.

"Why, Mr. Gramont," he observed, nervously, "about the rest of the gang, we'll take care of 'em, sure! But it's different with Mr. Fell, here. He's a friend of the senator—"

"Different, h—ll!" snapped Gramont, angrily. "He's a criminal, no matter who his friends may be, and I have the proof of it!"

"Well, that may be so," admitted the chief of police. "But this thing is goin' to raise a h—l of a scandal, all up and down the state! You know that as well as I do. Now, if I was you, I'd act kind of slow—"

Gramont smiled bitterly.

"Perhaps you would, chief. In fact, I don't doubt that you would. But you are not me. Now, as a duly-appointed officer acting under authority of the governor of the state, I call upon you to arrest this criminal, and I make you duly responsible for his safe-keeping. Do you dare refuse?"

The chief hesitated. He looked at Fell for help, but none came. Fell seemed to be rather amused by the situation.

Gramont leaned back in his chair. The [illegible] features of the [illegible] were [illegible]; [illegible]

[illegible]

"Certainly not; I speak of our mutual friend here," and Fell indicated the chief with a bland gesture. "I believe that Judge Forester of this city is at present consulting with the governor at Baton Rouge on political matters. With them, also, is Senator Flaxman, who has come from Washington on the same errand. Now, it would be a very simple matter to end all this anxiety. Suppose that you call up the governor on long distance, from this telephone, and get his assurance that I am not to be arrested. Then you'll be convinced."

Gramont laughed with deep anger.

"You gangsters are all alike!" he said, turning to the desk telephone. "You think that because you have planted your slimy tentacles in high places you can do anything with absolute impunity. But the governor of this state is not in your clutches.

"He's a man, by heaven! I have his asurance that he'll prosecute to the limit whoever is behind this criminal gang—and he keeps his word! Don't think that if your friend the senator is with him, you will be saved. I'll call him, if only to show the chief, here, that influence is not going to count in this game."

Gramont took down the receiver, called long distance, and put in a hurried call for the executive mansion, asking for the governor in person.

"So you think that he's immune from influence, do you?" Jachin Fell smiled patronizingly and lighted a fresh cigar. The chief of police was mopping his brow.

"My dear Gramont, you exhibit a youthful confidence in human nature! Let me topple your clay-footed idol from its pedestal in a hurry. Mention to the governor that you have me under arrest, and that I have asked him to speak with Judge Forester and Senator Flaxman before confirming the arrest. I'll wager you five hundred dollars—"

The telephone rang sharply. Taunted almost beyond endurance, Gramont seized the instrument and made answer. In a moment he had the governor on the wire. His gaze went exultantly to Fell.

"Governor, this is Henry Gramont speaking," he said. I've just succeeded in my work, as I wired you this afternoon—no, hold on a minute! This is important.

"The head of the entire gang is a man here in New Orleans by the name of Jachin Fell. Yes, Fell. I find it very hard to get him arrested. Fell boasts that his influence is superior to any that I can bring to bear. He asks that you speak with Judge Forester and Senator Flaxman before confirming the arrest, and boasts that you will order me to keep my hands off.

"Speak with them, governor! If they're in the gang, too, don't you worry. You confirm this arrest, and I'll put Fell behind the bars if I have to turn all New Orleans inside out. Go ahead! I know you can't be reached by any of these crooks—I'm merely calling Fell's bluff. We have the chief of police here, and he's sweating. Eh? Sure. Take as long as you like, governor."

He smiled grimly at Jachin Fell as he waited. Two minutes passed—three—four. Then he heard the voice of the governor again.

"Yes?"

"Don't arrest him, Gramont."

"What?" Gramont gasped.

"Don't touch him, I said! Get in all the others, no matter who they are, but leave Fell alone—"

"You d—d coward!" shouted Gramont, in a heat of fury. "So this is the way you keep your promises, is it? And I thought you were above all influences—real American! You're a h—l of a governor—oh, I don't want to hear any more from you."

He jerked up the receiver.

There was a moment of dead silence in the room. The chief mopped his brow, in evident relief. Jachin Fell sat back in his chair and scrutinized Gramont with his thin-lipped smile.

Gramont sat helpless, wrung by chagrin, rage and impotency. There was nothing he could say, nothing he could do. The man behind him had failed him. The entire power of the state, which had been behind him, had failed him. There was no higher power to which he could appeal, except the power of the federal government. His head jerked up sharply.

"Fell, I've got evidence on you, and I've got the evidence to put this lottery business into federal hands. Boys! come in here!"

At his shout the door opened and two of his men entered. Gramont looked at the chief.

RADIO

THINGS THE RADIO NOVICE WILL NEED

Tools and Materials He Should Keep on Hand—Advantages of Keeping a Log Book.

We are going to pause in explaining the theory of radio receivers and get down to practical things for today. There are many novices building their own sets, or making additional parts, who are in doubt as to just what tools and materials they will neeu.

Naturally there are tools and tools. Some cost more than others. Then, there are people and people. Some people need more tools than others. Some folks are just naturally handy with tools, and others find that tools won't behave and lead the user into all sorts of complications.

The tools and materials following are such as are necessary, and which will be useful at all times. No prices are given for the buyer will have to look to his pocketbook for guidance in this respect.

Tools that will come in handy; large, medium and small screwdrivers; flat, three-cornered and round file; hack saw, miter saw and box and cross-cut saw; a small plane, a vise, a bit and auger, pliers, a square and yardstick or tape rule, dividers and hammer, preferably a small one.

Materials that will be convenient to have on hand are as follows: Sandpaper, emery paper, wire of all gauges, round and flat-headed screws, a supply of brass nuts and washers, paraffine and sealing wax, bakelite, cardboard and fiber board, tinfoil, porcelain insulators, binding posts and terminals, sheet copper and sheet brass and adhesive tape.

Tape is possibly the most useful article in the whole layout, for it will be found to have many uses. It is in short a versatile piece of material in the electrician's kit.

Those of our readers who are building sets may find that it is good policy to keep all the odds and ends of wire, tape, copper, etc., that they may have. It seems that uses for these short bits are always to be found just when it is discovered that they have been thrown away. So, therefore, hoard all small pieces.

One thing we want to stress in building radio apparatus: Use care in your work, and put a good finish on your sets. Not only does it greatly add to the appearance of the set, but it also eliminates odd corners and stray ends of wire that catch dust or catch on surrounding objects and will hamper the efficiency of the set, either by shorting the circuit or causing it to be dragged off a pedestal and thrown on the floor. Those who have vacuum tube sets know that usually a fall means some new tubes.

To those radio novices who desire to go skipping blithely through the ether, picking out a station here and a station there, as fancy directs them, we recommend a log book. Just any sort of book will do, or rather any book will do in which one can jot down records of the evening's broadcasting.

The reason for the log book is that it prevents a lot of unnecessary fussing with the dials when a certain station is desired. Say, for instance, KDKA was going nicely, but that there was a certain concert going on in New York at WUZ or WGY, or maybe WGI up in Boston. Let us make the problem even harder and say that there were two addresses in one evening, both especially good, and one of the addresses in New York was scheduled to start two minutes after the one in Pittsburgh was over. As soon as the one address is over, the enthusiast starts playing with his dials to catch New York. Sometimes it takes two minutes and sometimes it takes a great deal more time to catch the desired signal, and more often than not, the lecture is half over before it is tuned in correctly.

To assist the enthusiast to tune in quickly on any desired station is the mission of the log book. In this book should be entered the necessary data about all stations that have been picked up. Here should be noted down the exact position of the dials where the station was tuned in the best and other pertinent remarks. All these remarks should be entered, of course, the first time a new broadcasting station is picked up. With the information before him, the enthusiast needs but a glance at his book to tell him how he set his dials the last time he heard WJZ.

The oft heard remark to the [illegible] that [illegible] was heard last night [illegible] cannot be heard tonight, [illegible] about, that is, providing one's set has range enough for the distance.

No directions are set down here for making a log book as it is thought that each one of the radio folk will have his own ideas on the subject. However, space should be left to inscribe even the minutest data about signal reception.

MEANING OF "FREQUENCIES"

Distinction Between "Audio" and "Radio" Must Be Learned Early by the Beginner.

A newcomer into radio experimenting ranks is often perplexed by the two terms called audio frequency and radio frequency.

The necessity of making a distinction in the frequencies in radio is important. It is generally known that vibrations of over 20,000 a second are inaudible to the human ear. The radio transmitters, depending upon their design, emit vibrations always running into tens or even hundreds of thousands, and are known as radio frequencies. In the reception of these waves it is necessary to reduce them to within the range of audibility of our ears.

Therefore, an arbitrary division has been made by radio engineers and designers to differentiate between the two frequencies. All frequencies above 10,000 are alluded to as radio frequencies and all below 10,000 as audio frequencies.

It must be remembered whenever the question of frequency is met with in the study of radio that radio frequency is that used in transmission and that it must ultimately, by various methods, be reduced to audio frequency in order that the telephone receivers commonly used for the reception of signals may function.

This is analogous to the transmission of power over great distances by wire. It is generally carried at a high voltage over the greater distance, and by means of step-down transformers converted to a voltage of 110 volts, ordinarily used in our household scheme.

By means of detectors, either crystal or tube, which are really rectifiers, we convert radio frequencies to audio frequencies. These detectors lop off, as it were, one-half of the cycle, permitting only a flow in one direction, the other alternation being almost eliminated.

Radio Strange to Him.

The modern schoolboy knows wireless from A to Z and can rattle off the terms with a fluency that staggers the casual dabbler in the new art. In some sections of the country, however, only rumors of the wonders of wireless have seeped in, and the native isn't quite sure what it is all about.

In Bleecker, a little hamlet outside of Gloversville, N. Y., a progressive farmer was erecting poles for his aerial the other day for the purpose of getting crop reports and weather forecasts. A neighbor happened along and learning that the work had something to do with wireless asked: "Which pole does that feller sing off of."

RADIO SPARKS

Doctor Marconi recently stated to an interviewer that he believed radio atmospheric disturbances came from the land and not from the sea.

A writer says, "With radio, Robinson Crusoe would have had quite a 'jazzy' time." We have always thought that radio was one of the things that Professor Nemo had 3,000 leagues under the sea and that it was in daily

When a steady hum is heard in the receivers after wiring up a set, it may be understood that there is an open circuit somewhere. Trace out the wiring carefully and some little fault will present itself.

The electric light socket aerial has appeared in France and is becoming popular. A French engineer has just turned out some of these devices, which are being purchased by the government for distribution to the farmers.

Some of the youngsters are getting the best of the landlord by erecting clothesline antennae, where aerials are forbidden on the housetops. It is found that even when the wire is hung with drying clothes good results are obtained through radio clotheslines.

The first radio theater is to be installed in the Grand Central hotel in New York city. It will seat more than 1,000 persons and will be made commodious enough to accommodate a large throng on a dancing floor in a pavilion adjoining. Entertainment and dance music will be picked up from the air.

Daddy's Evening Fairy Tale

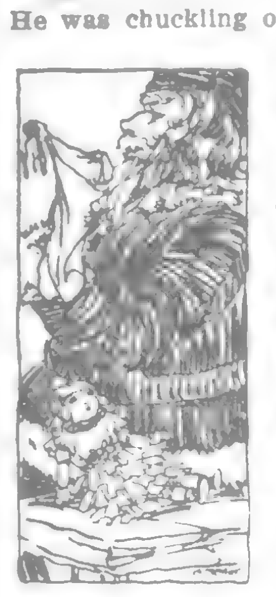
SANTA'S SECRET



"The Very Material."

Santa Claus was in his workshop. He was chuckling over the letters he had received. There was one from Lucy asking him for a doll with a blue hood. Just why Lucy wanted a blue hood for her doll he didn't quite know.

But he would see that the doll wore a blue hood. In fact he had the very material which would make a most charming hood.

Then there was a letter from Gwen. Gwen was very anxious for a pair of new skates. She wanted the kind that came all fastened to the boots and she thought she was big enough for them by now. She did hope dear Santa Claus would think so too.

Santa Claus smiled to himself as he read that. Yes, he thought Gwen was big enough this year.

Then Teddy wanted a train with an engine which had headlights. That would be particularly nice, he thought. And he hoped Santa Claus had been well all through the year and hadn't caught any cold up so far North. He had had a cold himself for a while in the fall but it was all gone now.

Then there was a letter from Rose. Rose was a friend of animals. She was so devoted to them and loved to know all the interesting things they did. Rose wanted a book about animals. He would be sure that she had this too.

There was a letter from Anne and she wanted a book about the fairies. Well, she would have this book by all means. Anne hoped that Santa Claus would find time to get home so he could have a good hot dinner on Xmas day. That was very kind and thoughtful in Anne.

There was a letter from Maggie and she asked for dates and grapes and oranges and candy. Dear little Maggie! How he did love her. And Maggie was always asking for good things to eat. Maggie was so cunning and so sweet.

Little Eugene had asked for a train. He wanted one with stations and bridges and signals and tunnels if that was possible, but if not, he would be glad to have a train of cars and an engine, or just an engine and coal cart and one coach would do.

That was like little Eugene. He gave Santa the chance to get a very big and beautiful present if he wanted to (or could do so with all of the things he had to attend to) or he would be quite happy and quite satisfied with something very much simpler.

Santa Claus was very fond of him. He was so perfectly natural and cheery and jolly.

But as Santa Claus read the letters over again and made notes on his great lists which he now had hanging along the walls of his workshop he said to himself: "It does Santa's heart good to read the letters but oh, how they amuse me, too. They tell me that they've been so good and of course I'm delighted to hear it. And they tell me that their mothers and their daddies, too, say they have been so good. Of course that is very nice!

"But Santa remembers when his letters came from these very daddies and mothers and how they said that their mothers and their daddies said they had been good!

"So I'm sending this secret to some of my children this year and that is that Santa remembers these letters from the mothers and daddies when they were young.

"With My Love."

"Oh, Santa is delighted beyond words to hear of goodness, and above all he loves kindness and unselfishness. But the children can know this secret—that their daddies and their mothers too, had to try to be good and didn't always find it as easy as easy could be!

"Though none of them, and none of you, ever really made Santa Claus look sad. And that is what Santa couldn't bear.

"For, as you all know, Santa Claus is kept young by the smiles and the laughter of children and he loves to stay just as he is now.

"And I'm going to send these messages with my love and with the secret about the daddies and the mothers to the children this very evening."

INDIANA BREVITIES

Shoals.—Because Edgar Witcher, cashier of the Martin County bank, was kind to Mrs. Martha Mercer, and, as she expresses it in her will, provided an easy chair for her to sit in while transacting business in the bank, he receives a considerable sum of money by her will. Mrs. Mercer was a widow, without near relatives. In the will she makes a specific bequest of $200 to Mr. Witcher, and then makes him one of the five residuary legatees. Her estate will amount to about $7,000, and Mr. Witcher's share will be about $1,000.

Shelbyville.—Delmon Clark, trustee of Washington township, Shelby county, was found not guilty of a charge of assault and battery on William Herrod, a neighbor, following a hearing in police court. Lee Hoop, mayor and judge of police court, in making his decision, said that the incident resulting in the charge had grown out of politics and, while a disgraceful affair, he would find Clark not guilty.

Indianapolis.—The plea that his wife had "died in spirit" failed to win the approval of the Supreme court for Willard W. Long, who was convicted of bigamy. The Supreme court, in affirming his conviction, ruled that the laws of the land took precedence over a "higher spirit" which Long declared prompted him to wed Marjorie McFall, his nineteen-year-old bookkeeper, while his wife was still living.

Wabash.—A jury in the Wabash Circuit court awarded Charles Farthing $3,500 damages against the Indian Refining company. Farthing's wife was killed when she attempted to start a fire in a stove by using gasoline. It was alleged that the company sold gasoline to a Wabash firm as kerosene and that it was retailed as kerosene to Farthing.
